cule that would attach to his far-flung fame by telling every stranger that addresses him that he is "the mysterious Mr. Raffles." Yet one of the strangers will be "the mysterious Mr. Raffles," and if he guesses which one is that person he will receive $500 as his "reward." As Burns' monthly stipend of $650 has been cut off by an injunction suit, that Raffles $500 would come in handy as a substitute fund. Therefore it is for the pecuniary interest of Burns to say to Mr. Donohue, "You are the mysterious Mr. Raffles." I am no friend of Sleuth Burns, but I would advise him to beware of anyone who stops him in the street and says to him, "You are the mysterious Mr. Burns." I warn him to think several times before he answers, "You are the mysterious Mr. Raffles." He must not be too eager to win that $500, for only one of these persons who tell him that he is "the mysterious Mr. Burns" will be "the mysterious Mr. Raffles." As the newspaper horoscopists say, "About this time exercise great care in dealing with affable or talkative strangers," so "the mysterious Mr. Burns" must bring all his intellect and experience to bear on the question "Am I being detected by the mysterious Mr. Raffles?" whenever " an affable or talkative stranger" stops him in the street to tell him that he is "the mysterious Mr. Burns." And if Mr. Donohue "gets away" with Sleuth Burns what a laugh we will have at the expense of the great self-made detective!

"Have you anything to say," asked the Judge of the convicted murderer who was about to be sentenced.

"Just a word," said the prisoner. "I am opposed to capital punishment."

Some Incredible News

In vain have I scanned the columns of the dailies for news from Bakersfield. There's a lot of interesting news in Bakersfield, news that might serve to enlighten some of our perfervid critics of the courts and aid them to an apprehension of things beneath the surface in this tartuffe-ridden city. The news in Bakersfield might enable that dull-witted individual, the average citizen, to glimpse a significant coincidence in the circumstance of Luther Brown's being put on trial at this time. In Bakersfield the case of the Pharisee brothers, Older and Crothers, has been set for trial next Tuesday. They are charged with having libeled Will Tevis, and their sensibilities have been wrought upon by the prospect of going to jail. The Brown trial in which Older is interested, being the complaining witness, may serve as a pretext for a postponement of the Older case in Bakersfield. See? But this is not the extent of the maneuvering and jockeying by which certain eminent citizens are now exhibiting their cunning and exposing their nervous apprehension. The Pharisee brothers, it will be remembered, had themselves arrested in this city nine months ago on the very charge upon which they had been arrested in Bakersfield. They went through a mock trial at the expense of the dear people hoping to suggestionize by a fake verdict the court in Bakersfield. Apparently this stratagem was in vain. A little while ago their attorney went down to Bakersfield and told the judge that his clients believed that he was prejudiced and would like to be tried by some other judge. Nothing in the papers about this. The newspapers stand together in all libel cases even to the extent of disproving the old axiom that when rogues fall out honest men get their due, for there are rogues in journalism and they fall out, but they suppress news of libel suits for mutual protection and thus are they rendered more or less immune from punishment for the dastardly crime of libel and likewise rendered more or less bold in the tyranny which they exercise over the people. But, to come back from my disgression: the accommodating Bakersfield judge as soon as his impartiality was questioned, called in Judge Nutter of Stockton. Were the Pharisee brothers satisfied? No, they immediately gave notice of intention to move that Judge Nutter grant them a change of venue beyond the confines of Bakersfield. Incredible? Yes, it is hard to believe that men who but recently were expounding the iniquity of the change-of-venue bill would themselves not only side-step a court but also attempt to leap the boundaries of a county. It's not only incredible; it's preposterous. It's of the type of news that the good and pure Mr. Older says he wouldn't publish because he knows nobody would believe it. I'll bet a copy of Town Talk against Mr. Crothers' conscience that Professor Boke will regard this paragraph as a joke.

The Calhoun Case

Every friend of the moral uplift, every admirer of the Uplifters, is giving close attention to the trial of Patrick Calhoun and earnestly hoping that the celebrated and irascible special prosecutor has a plenitude of winning cards up his sleeve. Most of them are persuaded that he is holding his best hand in reserve, and it would grieve them very much were it to turn out that his strong suits have been exhausted. It would not be dealing in extravagancies of rhetoric to say that the public mind itself would experience a tremendous shock were it finally to appear that the foundation stone upon which rests the charge against Patrick Calhoun was fashioned of the testimony of Boodler Nicholas and Boodler Gallagher. The question of Patrick Calhoun's guilt or innocence is one of somewhat exquisite texture. It resolves itself down to this simple question: Did Gallagher tell Nicholas that he would be paid for voting for the trolley franchise? This question has been answered in the affirmative by Gallagher and by Nicholas, but on other occasions when the importance of this affirmative answer was not so apparent as it became immediately that Calhoun was placed on trial they gave testimony under oath in direct conflict with their sworn utterances before Judge Lawlor. Now there is no conceivable set of circumstances that can shed any light on the pivotal question. Apparently the jury must be guided by Gallagher and Nicholas whose testimony prior to this trial were it now to be accepted would be fatal to the hopes of our gallant uplifters.

The Witnesses and Their Testimony

It seems almost incredible that a jury would be asked to find Calhoun guilty on the testimony of Gallagher and Nicholas. Furthermore, it is incredible that a jury would for a moment consider the testimony of these two witnesses in view of all that has been told in court with reference to the relations existing between the boodlers and the District Attorney's office. The spectacle presented by these men on the witness stand as acknowledged agents of the prosecution is the most remarkable, the most revolting that has ever been witnessed in an American court room. The principle of immunity is that it may be given if the court believes that it has been earned and that it is deserved. The idea that it shall be bargained and sold in advance is abhorrent enough to the principles of justice, but in the Calhoun case the ugliness of the deal is heightened by elements that ought to engage the attention of the grand jury. Out of the mouths of witnesses we learn that they are testifying in peril of imprisonment; we learn that it is within the power of the prosecution to determine what testimony shall be considered satisfactory; that despite the contract of immunity one witness was indicted for not testifying in accordance with the program; that another having been told his testimony was not satisfactory, visited a prosecuting officer, returned to the witness stand and "made good." We have even learned from one of the "satisfactory" witnesses that he was asked by an officer of the prosecution to perjure himself. In addition to all these things we know from testimony that has been given that supervisors did receive money which had not been promised them, and yet this whole case hinges on the question: Was Nicholas promised money before he voted? Is there a member of the League of Justice who will have the boldness to assert that in all the circumstances of the case he could conscientiously vote to find Calhoun guilty?

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks

The long looked for decision in the Reading case was handed down on Monday. Its first effect was a quick decline in security values upon a misapprehension of its true meaning. The decline was of short duration. As the decision was found to be in favor of Reading a sharp advance was quickly made, from two to four dollars per share, the strength spreading throughout the entire list. There is a feeling of confidence making its way into the channels of speculation. President Taft is evidently trying in every way to avoid clogging the wheels of progress at the same time he does not propose to allow corporate powers to go beyond legitimate bounds. Now that capital has a reasonable show there should not be anything to stop the many large improvements contemplated by practically all of the leading railways of the country. This will give employment to labor thereby starting money to circulate freely, helping as it will all branches of trade. Crop conditions are reasonably good, especially is this true throughout the country west of the Rockies. With good crops and a continuance of the present high prices for farm products there can be nothing to stop prosperity for at least two years. The stocks safest to purchase are New York Central, Northern Pacific, Great Northern, Pennsylvania, Baltimore & Ohio and stocks of this character. There is a rumor afloat to the effect that the stock of the Western Union Telegraph Company is being purchased by one of the large Eastern telephone companies; that Western Union stock will go to 100 on this arrangement; the securities of the telephone companies of the country are receiving more attention from investors than ever before.

Grain

Conditions for the Chicago wheat trade for the past week were of a remarkable kind, and the action in the market was equally so. The week began with the trade badly demoralized by the long break of nearly thirteen cents per bushel the previous week. The leading bears in Chicago and New York took advantage of the nervous trade and forced a further break, carrying July down to 105 3-4 at low point Monday. September wheat sold at the same time as low as 99 3-4. This was the climax of the storm of selling. The big shorts made quick time in covering several million bushels of wheat. The next morning the trade woke up to the fact that the market was over-sold, that important conditions on which high prices had been established during the Patten bull campaign were not changed, that cash wheat prices did not tumble with the break in futures, and that decreasing stocks, doubtful conditions for the growing crop and over-sold pit trade put the market in shape for recovery. Prices started on an advance as rapidly as was the decline. During the middle of the week July was up to 111 1-2 and during the closing days of the week that option sold as high as 112 3-4, with only natural reactions due to profit-taking. Extreme cold weather and frosted fields over the entire Northwest, and freezing conditions for most of the wheat states as late as last Saturday, caused the bull feeling. Minneapolis decreased stocks about one million bushels for the week, and at this rate decrease is likely to continue. Deliveries of over two million bushels Saturday morning were taken by the Bartlett-Patten house and we look for the wheat to be sold and shipped faster than before. Other deliveries will follow, but there is a demand for every bushel of wheat in sight. The official report, May 7th, will show much abandoned acreage. The Southwest is trying to buy wheat in the Northwest, Kansas City taking five hundred thousand bushels at Minneapolis today. We cannot get away from this cash and commercial situation.

Cotton

Weekly trade reports were fairly good, for while the export demand was checked by higher prices in Manchester, the home demand in England continued to improve. In the United States the textile situation is good, there being an increased demand for the finer makes, which is a favorable feature. Thirty-seven milling corporations in New England are planning new constructions in various forms at an aggregate outlay of $20,000,000. Four large new plants, costing more that $7,000,000, are under way. The barometer of trade, the metal markets, is decidedly more promising, as a result of the better demand for mill products, iron, copper and steel sharing in the improvement. The most interesting feature on the surface is the following press dispatch from St. Paul, Minn.:

"ST. PAUL, Minn., April 30.—One million bales of cotton to be moved from Mobile, Ala., to Yokohama, Japan. This is Jim Hill's great contract this year, one of the greatest transportation tasks ever undertaken. The landing of the contract marks a new era for the South, for the Northwest and Japan. It means a new market for the South, more work for the railroad men, across the country, and a mammoth increase in Japan's new cotton industry." The construction placed upon the above message is that freight arrangements have been contracted to move one million bales of American cotton next season to Japan, or about seven hundred and fifty bales more than will be taken by Japan and China this year, and about six hundred and sixty-six thousand more than the Orient ever took before; largest previous shipments having been three hundred and thirty-four thousand in the season of 1904-05. It is probable that progressive Japan has discovered that the limited possibilities of India willl not suffice to provide for her wants of raw cotton and that she, Japan, must turn to the Southern states of America for her future requirements. This new and important development makes it more imperative than ever for the South to make a large cotton crop next season, for with the world at peace, a crop of nearly fourteen million bales would not appear to be any too large under the circumstances.

Chicken Pox in Society

Miss Maude Bourne, one of the bridesmaids chosen to attend Miss Margaret Newhall, is confined to her home, suffering from a severe attack of that juvenile malady, chicken pox, and it is feared that she will be unable to take her place at the pretty ceremony on the wedding day. All the arrangements have been completed, and at high noon on Wednesday, May 12th, it will take place at Trinity Church, the Rev. Dr. Clampett officiating. Miss Marion Newhall will be the maid of honor, and the other attendants, Miss Maude Bourne, Miss Marjorie Josselyn, Miss Helen Cheeseborough and Miss Elizabeth Newhall, will be attired in exquisite pink frocks and carry bouquets of pink orchids. All the decorations will be in pink, likewise. The ushers will be Walter Hobart, Stewart Lowrey, Arthur Cheeseborough, Raymond Armsby, Laurence Scott, and Walter Martin. Dr. Henry Stevens Kierstadt will attend his brother-in-law, Athole McBean, as best man. The bride will introduce several new fashions which seem too sensible to be regarded as fads. As the sleeves of her wedding robe will be very long, she will dispense with gloves. The wedding veil, a creation of the modiste's art, will be so arranged that an extra fold will cover her face. After the ceremony, as she turns from the altar, instead of throwing back the long veil, as is the usual custom, a little silken cord will be loosened, and the gauze which shrouded the bride's countenance will fall aside, leaving untouched the graceful folds of the long veil. Seldom has a bride so many and such handsome tokens as has Miss Newhall. On their return from their European tour, which will not be until next August, the McBeans will take up housekeeping in a modest flat.

Engagement Rumors

A most elaborate dinner in honor of Miss Margaret Newhall and Athole McBean was given last week and the guests confidently expected that advantage would be taken of the occasion to announce the engagement of a charming girl to the most eligible bachelor on the list, for everyone feels assured that the engagement is one of Cupid's most recent achievements. While the devotion of Templeton Crocker has been open and undisguised, the reappearance of another young man on the scene has served to stimulate speculation. With almost as much confidence as is placed in the rumors of this engagement, the gossips are predicting that the pretty sister of next week's popular bride has a little secret of her own shared thus far only with one of the ushers of the wedding, but she persists in strenuously denying it, and being the one most interested, surely she ought to know. She is a vivacious and interesting girl, and a scalp more or less to dangle at her belt hardly gives her a minute's concern. Thus far in her social career she has been heart whole and fancy free, and seems to enjoy her present company without sighs for the absent,

Azalea Keyes Engagement

The news of the engagement of Azalea Keyes and Alfred Heilman was received with rejoicing by local society, for, up to the last four years, Miss Keyes made her home in San Francisco and here she has hosts of warm friends, though of late they have seen nothing of her save in the glimpses they have caught while on the other side. Azalea Keyes made her debut under the chaperonage of Mrs. Monroe Salisbury shortly after the marriage of the latter's daughter, to Alexander Keyes, uncle of the debutante. On the death of her father, the late Winfield S. Keyes, Azalea was heiress to a very large fortune with an income approximating four thousand dollars a month. While not pretty according to strict canons, she is bright, attractive and pleasing. She has the virtues of loyalty and sincerity, and is clever as well as warm hearted, and it was a cause of general regret when she decided, after her second trip to Paris, to make that city her permanent home. Her apartment is very handsome, and she has entertained her California friends elaborately there. Since living abroad rumor has coupled the name of Azalea Keyes with that of more than one title, but always without sanction or confirmation. Lately, the gossip has been concerned with her automobile trips and entertainment of friends and people had begun to enroll her in the list of bachelor maids. Her own family, however, was well aware of the attachment existing between her and Mr. Heilman, whose devotion has been known to them for two or three years, though in deference to the wishes of Miss Keyes they have loyally kept her secret. The date for the wedding has been set early in June, when it will take place in Paris, which will continue to be their home, although Mr. Heilman's business interests call him to Manchester for a portion of every year.

When Miss Keeney Goes East

Nobody will be very much surprised if the announcement of Miss Innes Keeney's engagement is announced before she goes to St. Louis. The young man, who is just graduating from the University of California, will be loth, it is said, to let her go to a new field of triumph and conquest without safeguarding his interests with a promise and binding it with a ring. This dashing Californian girl is bound to create a sensation and flutter masculine hearts wherever she goes. She has smashed all records in local society.

Miss Sears Has a Suitor

Word comes from the east to the effect that Miss Eleanora Sears has been receiving the devoted attentions of one of the English polo players who proved his prowess on the Burlingame field, and that he is likely to oust the athletic Alfred Vanderbilt from the heart of the much sought after "Tommy" Sears. Down at Burlingame the news has been received as a tax on credulity; not because Miss Sears is unlikely to arouse sentimental emotion but because it is believed that she is a confirmed bachelor maid and would indignantly resent anything that savored of courtship.

A Candidate for Social Honors

It is persistently rumored that the Japanese Consul-General has social aspirations for his pretty little wife, and that he confidently expects the local four-hundred to take her up and make much of her after the fashion of Washington society with the wives of the Oriental diplomats. This attempt to "break in" will be watched with interest by the Occidental climbers whose own experiences along the same line have proved disastrous. That the dainty little Mrs. Matzuso Nagai has all the qualifications that go to make for social popularity is unquestionable but whether the stony-hearted Blingumites will make a pet or a fad of her is another matter. There are more things than kissing that go by favor.

A Sculptor's Affinity

According to Vance Thompson in the Examiner of Sunday last, the announcement has been made in Paris of "the forthcoming marriage of Frederick MacMonnies, the sculptor, with Alice Jones, daughter of the late Senator Jones of Nevada." This news provoked a flutter of interest in local society, the Jones's of Nevada being related by marriage to some of our first families. The story accompanying the news of the engagement is somewhat sensational, for Thompson clearly insinuates that Miss Jones alienated the affections of the artist

A Blingum Episode

An amusing incident in connection with the recent polo games is related of the majestic and distinguished Mrs. Francis Carolan. With the air of Cleopatra or the Queen of Sheba—or Mrs. Pat Campbell—she trailed her sweeping gown over the grass to a seat on the side lines, which had been placed in position for her special benefit, and there, comfortably arranged and attended by at least half a dozen men, with the air of courtiers in waiting on a sovereign, she looked on at the game. In the midst of the sport, however, the calm equilibrium of the group was sadly disturbed, for, charging down upon them came two polo ponies without their temporarily irresponsible riders, and a wild scramble for a place of safety was the immediate result. The little knot which surrounded Mrs. Carolan dissolved itself into its elements, and those who have hitherto believed that it was impossible for that lady to progress in any other manner than a majestic glide would have been enlightened, if not electrified could they have seen her, with her trail tucked up, in the midst of a veritable stampede. It was another exemplification of "The colonel's lady and Judy O'Grady."

Gossip from Del Monte

Mr. Charles Fee has sidetracked his private car at Del Monte while he enjoys his favorite relaxation on the golf links. Mr. Fee is a busy man, but whenever he can spare a day or two, he runs down to spend the time on the links. Mrs. Fee and his two daughters, Miss Marcia and Miss Elizabeth, are with him, with Miss Ernestine Fielder as their guest. Mr. and Mrs. James C. Fletcher are spending their honeymoon at Del Monte. The marriage of Miss Caroline Mills and Mr. Fletcher was the outcome of a pretty romance which began in Japan a Nothing was further from her anticipation then than that within a year she would return, a bride, to take up her residence in Yokohama. Mr. and Mrs. S. Waldo Coleman, who were recently married at Santa Cruz, are another bridal couple. Mrs. Coleman was Miss Margaret Lucile McCormack, as cousin of Lieutenant-Governor Porter and of Mrs. Florence Porter Pfingst, and the groom is the son of Mr. and Mrs. John C. Coleman, former owners of the great Grass Valley mine. Mr. and Mrs. Coleman will make their home in San Franyear ago, when Miss Mills was on a tour of the Orient. cisco. Mr. and Mrs. John G. Wartman of Los Angeles, Mr. and Mrs. John B. Keating of Redding and Mr. and Mrs. Henry D. Nichols are others of the recently married who are enjoying the pleasures of Del Monte. The Monterey Presidio has been somewhat enlivened by special drills and maneuvers in honor of Major Willy von Livonius, Military Attache of the German Embassy, who has come out to California for a brief glimpse of the coast. Miss Doherty and Miss Furey of Chicago are being made much of at the Presidio, and Mrs. Furey is coming in for her full share of appreciation, for she is an animated and popular chaperon. P. Kosakevitch, the Russian Consul stationed at San Francisco, spent last week at Del Monte. Automobile parties were numerous, amongst them that of Mrs. Cuyler Lee, who came for a week end; Mr. and Mrs. George W. Brooks and Mrs. Leo Devlin. Mr. and Mrs. Robert L. Coleman came down from Burlingame to spend a while with Mrs. Coleman's mother, Mrs. Simpkins. Later on they will join Mrs. Simpkins and spend the summer at Del Monte.

impending probabilities. Miss Dollie is the only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Cushing, but there is a young son who has distinguished himself at Stanford. Mrs. Cushing was Grace Eldridge, a daughter of the late J. Eldridge, the well known auctioneer, of the firm of Easton and Eldridge. They belonged to the old Rincon Hill and South Park aristocracy, and the Eldridge home, on Folsom street between Second and Third, was in the same row with those of the Popes, Parrotts, DeLongs and Lathams. Dollie Cushing is one of the most popular girls in her set. She is a daring and fearless rider, and almost boyish in her devotion to outdoor sports. "Jim" Jenkins, as he is familiarly called by his intimates, is an easterner who has been in California but a comparatively short time. He is a nephew of Mrs. Edwin L. Griffiths of Ross Valley. The precise date of the wedding has not yet been set, but it is understood that it will take place some time next fall. The Cushings passed the winter in Hillcrest, and have only recently returned to their summer home in Marin. Already Miss Dollie has been made the recipient of many handsome engagement tokens and many festivities are planned in her honor.

The Cunningham-Blackmer Engagement

The engagement of pretty little Edna Cunningham, youngest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. G. Loring Cunningham, to Adelbert Adams Blackmer, is the outcome of a friendship which began when this still youthful couple were small children. Miss Enid is a most vivacious and interesting girl, and possesses, amongst other attractions and accomplishments, a rich contralto voice. She is a member of the Monday Morning Club, which numbers on its roster many of the prominent social people of musical inclination. Miss Madge Cunningham, a sister of the bride to be, graduated last year from the University of California with honors. The brother, Ralph Cunningham, is a favorite in the young social set across the bay. The Cunninghams have resided in North Berkeley for a number of years. Mrs. Cunningham is a sister of Mrs. Lloyd Baldwin, so well known in the exclusive sets of Oakland and Berkeley. Mr. and Mrs. Cunningham and Miss Enid have been passing the winter in San Francisco, but they will return to Berkeley on the first of June, and later in the summer will go to their ranch at Saratoga.

Farce Comedy in Real Life

The culminating incident of a lively house party given across the bay last week was as amusing as it was embarrassing to those concerned in it. The household, which numbers amongst its members two charming daughters, entertained several of their young girl friends and an equal number of officers from the visiting naval vessels, and as the domicile was not designed on the plan and proportions of a family hotel, a process of "doubling-up" was resorted to. That was an insignificant circumstance, and indeed, only part of the fun. It seems, however, that the house was new and not thoroughly seasoned. One of the young officers was quartered in a room on the second story which was provided with two doors, one communicating directly with the hall and the other with an adjoining apartment occupied by one of the daughters and a guest. As two of the officers were scheduled for duty at an unearthly hour on Monday morning, it was their laudable intention to arise betimes and make their way silently from the premises, and but for the perversity of inanimate things, the plan would have been carried out to the letter. At half past five, the household was aroused by loud pounding and pommeling on the inside of the door leading from the hall to the room occupied by the lieutenant, and in response to anxious inquiries directed through the panels he answered: "I'm marooned. This door is stuck and not even heaven itself could open it an inch." Mater familias was concerned at this development, for the rules of army and navy life are inflexible. There was no porch or roof beneath the window of the prison, and no ladder available, so she put her woman's wit to work. "You girls get up," she called, to the occupants of the next room. "Come out through the hall and go to my room, and then Patsy can come through your room." Alas and alack! The other hall door proved to be just as tightly sealed as far as egress was concerned, and meanwhile time was passing. "Well, I see no other way out," she said, addressing the invisible audience, "but for you girls to stay in bed, and you, Patsy, to go through into their room, climb out their window, and make your way across the roof." It was a case of desperate remedies. The poor lieutenant was by this time so nervous that his fingers had all been converted into thumbs, and to add to his embarrassment the window showed an inclination to profit by the bad example of the doors. The whole establishment knew now what the trouble was, and the imprisoned daughter added oil to the flame by sitting up and importuning the unfortunate man to "Hurry up with that window for heaven's sake! If any one sees you climbing out of my bed room window at half past five o'clock in the morning I'm hopelessly compromised forever." Safe to say that speed was at a discount once liberty had been achieved.

In the Social Spotlight

Miss Suzanne Kirkpatrick, who is one of the most popular of the season's debutantes, entertained informally at tea in the Laurel Court of the Fairmont on Thursday. Mrs. Kirkpatrick and Miss Suzanne are spending the summer at their country home in Pleasanton, but are often in the city on short trips. Miss Kirkpatrick's guests were Miss Augusta Foute, Miss Dolly Cushing, Miss Marian Miller and Mrs. K. McDonald.

Colonel Rodman, U. S. A., who has been ill at the hospital in this city, left during the week for Washington, D. C., where he will visit his daughter, Mrs. Barnhardt, wife of Colonel Barnhardt, U. S. A.

The Misses Laura and Alexandra Hamilton, who have been abroad for a year, will arrive in San Francisco during the week.

Mrs. R. N. Graves, accompanied by her little grandsons, will leave the last of May for St. Helena, where she will remain until late in the fall.

Mrs. Norwood and Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Breeze have taken an attractive home in Belmont for the first of June, where they will pass the summer.

Mrs. Jerome Lincoln and Miss Ethel Lincoln will leave soon for their country place, 'Ethelwilde," near St. Helena, where they will spend the next four or five months.

Mrs. George Cadwalader and her mother, Mrs. Russell Wilson, returned from New York on Sunday evening. All the members of the family were at the depot to welcome the travelers, and Mrs. Wilson found her rooms at the Hotel Monroe a bower of roses and fragrant spring blossoms sent by relatives and friends.

Mrs. August Comte, Jr., received about a hundred ladies at her charming Guerrero street home on April 24th. The Monroe orchestra played during the reception hours and several of the guests entertained with vocal and instrumental selections. The popular hostess, herself so clever, is fortunate in numbering among her friends many acomplished artistes so that her affairs are always brilliant.

Monday evening, in the St. Francis, Knox Maddox entertained at a jolly dinner. Mr. and Mrs. Horace D. Pillsbury, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick McNear, Miss Josselyn, Mr. and Mrs. Laurance Scott and Miss Marjorie Josselyn enjoyed his hospitality.

The popularity of afternoon tea at the St. Francis has naturally increased very much with the opening of all the fashionable shops in the immediate neighborhood of Union Square, and with the White and Gold Room and Cafe filled every afternoon, it has been decided to start a special tea service in the Tapestry Room a little later on. Mrs. Eleanor Martin was hostess at a pleasant informal luncheon in the St. Francis a few afternoons ago, her guests being Mrs. Oscar Cooper, Miss Genevieve Walker and Miss Janet von Shroeder. At another table were Mrs. Charles Josselyn, Mrs. McDonlad Spencer, Mrs. Gerald Rathborne, Mrs. William Taylor, Miss Marjorie Josselyn and Miss Mary Josselyn.

A delightful tea given last week was that at which Mrs. Edward von Adelung of Berkeley was hostess. It was designed in honor of Mrs. Walter Morris Hart, wife of Professor Hart,

Odd Things in the World

In Denmark girls insure themselves against becoming old maids.

In Mohammedan countries women are not admitted beyond the doors of mosques.

It takes a Chinaman a whole week to get married and a popular wedding gift is a coffin.

The Japanese observe strict rules in the amount of water used in their flower receptacles. In spring they are nine-tenths full, in summer they are filled to repletion, while in winter very little water isused. Anything once used to hold flowers is never taken for any other purpose.

In Germany people attach great social importance to the sofa and distinguished guests are motioned towards it as though to a seat near the throne. No unmarried girl would dare to usurp the hallowed spot. That is a privilege of her elders and superiors.

A Servian belief is that any one who has hatched a chicken by holding an egg under the left arm pit for the requisite number of days is immune from violence. A robber who devastated the district of Kolubara for years was left unmolested, the belief being that he had accomplished the feat and was therefore invulnerable, rendering the peasants apathetic in pursuing and punishing him.

Donkeys and mules are employed in mines instead of horses because of a peculiarity which causes horses to throw up their heads when touched, while mules and donkeys lower theirs. As the passages in mines are never higher than barely sufficient, the horses, annoyed by bits of earth or rock dropping on their heads, would be constantly injuring themselves if not dashing their brains out.

A curious survival of a quaint custom was witnessed in one of the English law courts recently. The solicitor of the City of London attended before the King's remembrancer to render quitrent services in respect to certain properties in the City of London and the County of Salop. On the table were a block of wood, two fagots of twigs, six horse shoes and a bag of nails. Warrants were read calling upon the tenants of the property concerned to "come forth and do service," whereupon the city solicitor gravely placed one of the fagots on the block and cut it with a hatchet. Then he cut the second fagot with a billhook, and afterwards tendered the six horse shoes, and counted out sixty nails in heaps of ten, adding one extra nail, at which the King's remembrancer said "Good number." Then the city solicitor asked, "Has his majesty any orders regarding these implements?" and the King's remembrancer answered: "I will take them to be at the disposal of his majesty." This ended the ceremony, which dates back from over six centuries.

The Greet Players

The Ben Greet players in conjunction with the Russian Symphony Orchestra have been giving a week of Shakespearian performances at the Garrick Theatre. The orchestra, under the leadership of Modest Altschuler, comprises fifty men, and is one of the most thorough and capable bodies of musicians ever assembled under a baton. Monday evening they repeated their successful rendition of Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and Tuesday night played the Tschaikowsky and Sullivan settings of "The Tempest." The overture to "The Tempest" by Tschaikowsky was a magnificent piece of descriptive music played with all the beauty of tone and shading required to bring out the meaning of its various themes. The incidental music by Arthur Sullivan and the Glazunow interlude "Isle of Love" while beautiful and attractive were less magnificent in theme and color than the Tschaikowsky opening. Ben Greet has a larger stage than he had at old Lyric Hall, and makes more pretence at setting and scenery. The performance as a whole lacked vigor and go, though it had many good places. Ben Greet took the part of Caliban, and a most monstrous and hideous fellow he made of him. He had a hideous make up, half amphibian and half savage. His Caliban entirely lacked the comic element present in that of Louis James at the old Columbia some years ago. George Vivian was very successful as Ariel. He was light and easy in movement and looked eerie and sprite-like in his cobwebby vesture. Violet Vivian was an attractive Miranda and Milton Rosmer a handsome Ferdinand. The remainder of the cast was rather colorless. The masque of goddesses and spirits was prettily done, and added considerable life to the performance. The fine musical settings of the Shakespearian plays should make up for the absence of lavish scenery, and should attract larger houses.

—The Playgoer.

Nat C. Goodwin and Edna Goodrich

America's greatest comedian, Nat C. Goodwin, and his co-star, Edna Goodrich, will open a limited engagement for two weeks at the Van Ness Theatre on Monday evening, during which they will present plays entirely new to this city. No actor of the day has a stronger hold on the public than Nat Goodwin, and he has achieved this by clean, artistically presented fun. George Broadhurst, who is the author of some of the greatest modern successes of the American stage, has written for Mr. Goodwin and Miss Goodrich a comedy of rare delight entitled "The Easterner," which will be presented during the entire first week of this engagement. The play is in four acts and the locale is California. Supporting the stars are Neil O'Brien, Carl Anthony, Lowell E. Sherman, Arthur Behrens, Bud Woodthorpe, Edward M. Morrison, John Ahlberg, Zeffie Tilbury, Alice Butler, Pauline Lord and Anna Heritage. "The Master Hand," another new play, is announced for the second week. Matinee Saturday only.

"The Boys of Company B"

There is fun, action and color in every scene of "The Boys of Company B," which is to be revived at the Alcazar next Monday evening. When it was played in the Sutter-street house last season standing room only was obtainable ere the week expired, and another series of highly remunerative performances is assured, for the demand for its revival has been strong and insistent. Rida Johnson Young, author of "Brown of Harvard," wrote "The Boys of Company B" and thus supplied a vehicle that enables every member of the Alcazar company to exploit most effectively his or her best comedy talent. The militia men are a jolly, wholesome lot of young fellows who can give and take a joke and are prone to flirting, and the women are natural, everyday women. In the first act they are all assembled in a New York gymnasium, where they are preparing for Company B's annual camping out up the Hudson, and half-an-hour of downright jollity concludes with a proposal of marriage through a speaking tube. But the fun in the camp scene runs riot, and is interspersed with catchy songs by members of the company and a selected quartet. We see a soldier tossed in a blanket, and we see the hero kiss the camp flirt and thereby nearly lose his sweetheart who happens to witness the osculatory salute. Of course everything is cleared up to everyone's satisfaction in the final act. The spirit of goodfellowship that prevails among the boys makes men sigh to think they have passed that joyous period of life, and the feminine characters are so accurately drawn as to make the play delightful to the gentler sex. Bertram Lytell will again be seen as Lieutenant Tony Allen, and Evelyn Vaughan is sure to be charming as Eileen Maclane, the girl he loves and succeeds in winning despite her shrewd mother's opposition. Then we will have Will R. Walling and Ernest Glendinning as jolly militia men, Howard Hickman as the typical cad and bore, Burt Wesner as Tony's uncle, John B. Maher and Bessie Barriscale as lisping lovers, and Louise Brownell and Adele Belgarde in well-fitting roles. About a score of extra people are employed in the production, and the scenic side of it will be well worth looking at, as the military uniforms worn by the boys, and the summery attire of the ladies and the rural background make very attractive stage pictures.

"Sporting Life" at the Valencia

Hoyt's highly hilarious and best comedy, "A Texas Steer," will be seen at the Valencia Theatre for the last times this Sunday afternoon and evening. On Monday night "Sporting Life" will receive a stupendous production. Written by Seymour Hicks and Cecil Raleigh, "Sporting Life" is one of those monster scenic melodramas, filled to the brim with startling effects, which have from time to time been imported into this country from England and which have invariably made deep impressions upon the American theatregoing public. The story of John, Earl of Woodstock, is a vivid history of a devotee of sports, who with never failing good heart comes to the aid of his friends while he is affluent, only to find his friends few and far between when his riches are gone. At the outset of the play Woodstock is seen in his training stables, somewhat crippled by racing losses, but hopeful for the future, when his pet thoroughbred, Ladylove, will run in the Derby, and moreover when Norah Cavanagh, the real lady love of his heart, shall become his wife. Through the irresponsible actions of Norah's brother, Philip, Woodstock finds himself obligated to pay a large sum of money at a time when he has great calls on his purse, or to permit to be brought to light the disgrace in which Philip has involved himself and all his family. Woodstock pays and his home goes under the hammer. With an always hopeful heart he pins his faith to another protege, a young pugilist, only to see him succumb to drugs at the ringside. To save the day, Woodstock himself springs into the arena, declaring himself his own "Unknown," and after a spirited setto with a professional prize fighter wins the decision. Later, on the eve of Ladylove's race he is beset by toughs and is in danger of his life. How Woodstock fights his way to liberty and reaches the race course in time to see his Ladylove win and to win his lady love, makes a series of exciting incidents which bring the play to an end with a real dash and swing. The cast includes thirty-two speaking parts and the full strength of the Valencia Stock Company will be called upon for its rendition.

The Shakespearean Plays at the Garrick

The patrons of music and drama who have not yet been to the Garrick this week have a great treat in store for them this Friday night, when the Ben Greet Players and the Russian Symphony Orchestra will present that most beautiful of comedies, "As You Like It," with the music of Beethoven. It is his sixth Symphony, commonly known as the Pastoral and one of the best of his nine. On this Saturday night "Romeo and Juliet" will be given with Gounod's setting and the Overture Fantasie of Tschaikowsky. Between two of the scenes, the orchestra will render Glazounow's Interlude, "A Spanish Episode." The Gounod incidental music is beautiful and will include "The Quarrel of the Two Houses," "The Love Motif," "The Monastery," "The Wedding of Romeo and Juliet," "The Waltz Serenade," "Juliet's Slumber," and "The Union in Death." In this play Mr. Greet will take the part of "Friar Lawrence," and the leading roles will be played by Milton Rosmer and Miss Irene Rooke. The Elizabethan stage setting will be used. It is certain that never before have the spirit of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" been so faithfully and harmoniously blended as in the production of it which the Ben Greet Players and the Russian Orchestra have given during the past week and will give again this Sunday afternoon. A special performance of "The Tempest" will be given on Saturday afternoon at two o'clock in the Greek Theatre, Berkeley. The music rendered with this Swan Song of the master dramatist is that of Sir Arthur Sullivan. The artistic success resulting from the combined efforts of the scholarly Greet and the talented conductor, Modest Altschuler, is certainly remarkable. Such a combination is seldom brought to this coast. No one should overlook the opportunity of seeing what are certainly the most imposing Shakespearean presentation ever given here.

prodigy and astonished and delighted her large and fashionable audience. She is only seven years old, but she acquitted herself like a veteran, playing a difficult piano program of fourteen numbers entirely from memory, and with an artistic skill and mastery which would have been remarkable in one twice her age. Her diminutive size and dainty appearance were altogether disproportionate to the volume of sound she invoked from her instrument, and her versatility and artistic temperament were manifested in the interpretation which she rendered of widely contrasting compositions. Natural genius combined with excellent teaching have accomplished so much for this little girl in her tender babyhood that there is no predicting to what heights she may soar in the future.

Princess Theatre

The production of the rollicking musical whimsicality "Piff Paff Pouf" at the Princess Theatre next Monday night will be one of the strongest bids for popular favor possible for a theatrical management to make. Of all of the plays of its class none has achieved a wider or greater success and as quite a while has elapsed since its last presentation here its revival should prove very welcome. This delightful musical absurdity will be brought thoroughly up-to-date and many new and catchy numbers will be introduced. Beautiful scenery and costumes have been specially prepared and the cast will totally eclipse all previous ones of this play witnessed in this city. May Boley will have a splendid opportunity to exhibit her comic ability and versatility as Mrs. Lillian Montague whose four daughters, Rose Melon, Cora Melon, Nora Melon, and Encora Melon will be respectively impersonated by Helen Darling, Zoe Barnett, Ella Morris and Lydia Crane, while Bedelia, a well known Irish lady, will have a clever exponent in Ellen Crane. Fred Mace will be seen for the first time here as Peter Pouffler, a character in which he scored in New York. James F. Stevens will have a congenial role as Lord George Piffle.

The Burton Holmes Travelogues

The interesting Burton Holmes Travelogue on "Paris" will be given this Friday afternoon at 3:30 in Oakland at Ye Liberty Playhouse and this Friday night and Saturday afternoon in San Francisco at Christian Science Hall. After that the Travelogues will be given in the splendid Garrick Theatre commencing Sunday night with a repetition of "Paris." On Monday night the regular courses will be resumed and "London" will be given Monday and Tuesday nights and Wednesday afternoon. Mr. Holmes was in London this past summer taking pictures of the quaint and characteristic, the picturesque and the beautiful in this great city, so full of historic memories and modern beauties. The motion pictures will include many of the King and Queen taken at short range. During the latter part of the same week, on Thursday and Friday evenings and Saturday afternoon, "Fez" will be the subject—"Fez," the Moors' Metropolis in far away Morocco. It is not like the great cities that we all know, but is more wonderful and more fascinating in its isolation and decay than even the proudest of the great European capitals. Seats may be had at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, and at the theatre box office on Sunday after ten o'clock.

"Prisoner of Zenda" at the Liberty

Anthony Hope's fascinating romance, "The Prisoner of Zenda," will be the offering at the Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, for the week commencing next Monday evening, and its revival there should prove popular with across-the-bay theatregoers. "Zenda" is such a pretty story of love and sacrifice—such a picture of intense shadow and of high light that it is always welcomed. Seldom has any book been more successfully dramatized. The story as developed on the stage loses nothing in its force or in its appeal to the emotions. The complications which ensue upon the imprisonment of King Rudolph by Black Michel and the substitution in his place of Rudolph Rassendyll, the English Elphberg, through the cunning of Colonel Sapt, are all cleverly developed in the drama and woven into the most satisfying and successful "book play" the stage has known. Miss Helen Holmes returns for the part of the Princess Flavia and Landers Stevens will again appear in the dual role of the King and the adventurous Englishman. With Helene Lackaye as Antoinette de Mauban, Henry Shumer as Colonel Sapt, George Friend as Fritz, E. L. Bennison as Captain Rupert Hentzau and the remaining characters in the hands of competent players a splendid cast is assured, and as usual, the scenery will be up to the Liberty standard. "The Prisoner of Zenda" will have the usual run of one week. "Tennessee's Pardner" is the piece in preparation to follow.

Orpheum Vaudeville

Those who are grumbling about hard times should visit the beautiful new Orpheum whose immense capacity is taxed at every performance to the utmost and where the most exalted standard of vaudeville is reached. For next week the inducements are certainly very strong. The famous Russell Brothers who have been too long absent and who have no superiors as fun makers will present their screaming farce "Our Servant Girls" in which they impersonate a couple of hired help and give character delineations and impersonations of real people. With them is associated Flora Bonfanti Russell, a very handsome girl and an accomplished toe dancer. The Five Juggling Normans, agile club manipulators who perform astounding acrobatic feats, Frederick Allen, formerly with Charles Frohman companies supported by Bertha Van Norman and other capable people in the fanciful novelty "His Phantom Sweetheart," and Francini-Olloms, Europe's most accomplished Xylophomist and Concertinist, and a clever acrobat and juggler who plays his own accompaniment while turning twenty-four somersaults are other novelties on the bill. Next week will be the last of Angela Dolores and Co., The Melnotte Twins and Clay Smith, Hawthorne and Burt, and La Valera (Mrs. Horton Forrest Phipps).

The Minstrels

That a good, old-fashioned minstrel first part still has a strong hold upon theatregoers of San Francisco has been thoroughly demonstrated at the American Theatre, where I. P. Wilkerson's Minstrels of Today have been holding forth for two weeks to large and hilariously well-satisfied audiences. For the week commencing this Sunday afternoon everything will be changed from beginning to end and an entirely new routine of songs, jokes and surprises will be provided. For a change the vocalists and interlocutor, who have hitherto been appearing in white face, will hide their handsome visages with the same kind of burnt cork used by the end or "corner" men, so they call them in Australia. Noe J. LaVigne, the local baritone who is making his first appearance in the charmed semi-circle, will sing "The New Born King" by Geibest, and Frank Figoni, the basso, will be heard in Bullard's always welcome "Stein Song." Will Oakland, the contra-tenor, will sing a lot of "new" old favorites, and San Francisco's own Matt Keefe will vary his Tyrolean yodelings. Al. Jolson, who has established himself as an unqualified favorite, will be heard in many songs new to this city and will also spring his quota of surprises. John King, whose "Transmagnificanbandamyucality" is the talk of the town, will sing "Shoveling Coal," and Emil Subers, the "Georgia Sunflower," promises an unusually amusing effort. The first part will be brought to a close with "A Visit of the Darktown Band," in which, as the leader, John King will give one of his unrivaled wench impersonations. Wilkerson's Musical Comedy Company, under the clever stage direction of Bobby Harris, will produce, for the first time here, "Tid-Bits," a "Frivol," in one act. All of the favorites, including Robert Wilson, Lou Anger, Edward Cassano, Arthur Thorn, Edward Flynn, Ella Smyth, Anna Golde and Bertie Starrett, will appear, the costumes will be entirely new and beautiful, and the solos and concerted vocal numbers will include all of the recent New York successes.

"Come," I said, "you must not despair. Give me your name, I will take care of you and you can live without much trouble. Take this, any way."

She pushed back my outstretched hand.

"You are good, sir, but even if I had that and more, would I find those things which have now gone to the four corners of the earth? Because, you see, now I can't lie any more. It is finished. It is my punishment. Oh, I haven't told you the most terrible thing. This morning as the doctor was passing by he came in and looked at my husband's eyes. Then he took me aside and said:

"'Do you know, I shouldn't be surprised if he recovered his sight.'

"At first this filled me with a joy so great that I nearly fainted. And then suddenly there came to me the thought of my man looking at the empty house, the naked walls, seeking in vain for those little souvenirs of the dead, running to the harbor and not finding his boat. I thought of his sorrow, his anger, those poor old eyes which were to open only to cry again, even more than before; the look that he would give me, the thought that would come to him: had I not sold all that out of sheer laziness? Who knows? I cannot bear it—I will not. I had accustomed myself to suffer in silence, to think that I should always lie, and lie without danger. Now I dare not return. What excuse will I give for lying, lying?"

She covered her face with her hands and began to cry.

"Come, come," I said to her. "Remember that your husband has only you left. I will talk to him. Come with me."

She wiped her eyes with her knuckles and moved on after me.

"That's right," I said. "Let us go back together."

The night was very dark. The path leading down the cliff was so narrow that I had to go first. While we walked, however, I talked to her.

Suddenly, I seemed to hear close to me a voice saying: "Liar!" followed by a sound as of small stones crushed and rolling into the gulf beneath. But just at that moment I was compelled to grasp a rock to avoid falling, and this fear for a moment blotted out everything else.

A little lower the path widened, and the rays of the moon struck full upon the cliff. I gave a sigh of relief and said, laughing:

"This is a bad walk to take without a lantern. It is a road fit only for goats. Come, my good woman, lean on me."

No answer. I looked about me. I was alone. I called, I retraced my footsteps. Nothing, nothing but the mournful cry of an owl, far away. Then I remembered the sob that I had heard but a few moments ago, the word I seemed to have half guessed, the noise of the stones falling from the pathway, and I stood there a long time, very still.

All about me was the night, soft but impenetrable. Below, at the foot of the cliff, the waves lapped against the rock, and under the trembling light of the stars the sea seemed to heave again voluptuously.

MURINE EYE REMEDY CO., Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen:—We have a little fellow four months old who was troubled for three months after birth with sore eyes. A large amount of pus came from them, accompanied with severe inflammation. Our family Doctor, also an Eye Specialist, attended him without relief.

I saw your MURINE EYE REMEDY advertised in one of our Electric Cars, and utterly discouraged, I resolved to try it, and do you know, in three days' time all worry was over. In one week the Sore Eyes were a thing of the past.

This is an unasked for testimonial, but I know you will accept it as it is sent with much gratitude toward MURINE EYE REMEDY. Yours truly,

Arthur Snow.

MERCHANT TAILORING VS. READY TO WEAR

At a recent session of the Merchant Tailors' National Exchange, one of the important themes discussed was the retrogression of the tailoring business. One of the most celebrated business experts and experienced advertising man was introduced at that very meeting, and was asked to give his views and advice. In his address he reproached the merchant tailors for their lack of concerted advertising, for their lack of good argument, which should be as good as their opponents', for not using as good a method as the manufacturers of clothing, who are assailing them, etc., and for not answering back in the magazines or newspapers, which they are employing in order to put forth their side of the story. But it is hardly possible to cure a cancer by painting it over, to sling mud at each other and spill printers' ink, will not in the writer's idea put tailoring in the same place it once occupied. Their cause needs more drastic measures and the most essential thing is to go to the prime cause of this retrogression. There are two causes, important, which should be carefully considered before entering upon an extensive advertising campaign; one of these is inefficiency, the other, values.

There are two kinds of custom tailors—the practical, skilled artist, who considers a suit fit to deliver from his establishment when all the necessary details such as cloth, trimmings, cut, style, fit and work are in perfect unison. The artist tailor loves his work, and employs only the finest mechanics to carry out the details, and will use only such materials as will enable him to produce a creditable garment or suit. The price of this class of tailors' work will always be high, and tailors of this class will always thrive if they pursue proper business methods (advertising included). This class is above and not in competition with ready-to-wear clothing any more than a fine oil painting is to be compared with a lithograph.

On the other hand, there are the merchant tailors who have had neither training nor ideas and whose principal aim is to make clothes "to order" irrespective of artistic or intrinsic merits; to have them made up as cheaply as possible and get for them as much as possible. They do not enjoy the same facilities as the manufacturing clothiers, neither for the selection of woolens nor for the scientific cutting and assembling of their garments. Their products are without merit and are of far less value in competition with the ready-to-wear clothing. It is true that these last mentioned tailors do make clothes to order, but their discredited product, without question of doubt, delivers their customers into the hands of the dealer in ready-made clothes. They are mostly to blame for this retrogression in tailoring, and are responsible for the great strides which the ready-to-wear people have made, and will continue to make until there will be no more room for any but the very highest class of exclusive tailors. We would, therefore, suggest for the man who has the money and wants absolute exclusiveness, and who wants to spend from $150 to $1000 per year for clothes, to go to a high class tailor. On the other hand, the ready-to-wear will serve best those who wish to dress economically and correctly. Of course, there are some men so formed that, to be fitted, they must have their clothes made to order.

Now is the time of the year that the ever present question pervading the family council is, "Where shall we go, or what shall we do this summer?" The planning and scheming period is now upon us when our thoughts turn from the sordid pursuits of city life; for man hath need of rest and he longs for the simple joys the country yields. We all wish to set aside for awhile the cares and worries of business and visit the Blessed Isles of rest and recreation. To aid you in selecting a place for your outing or to locate your family for the summer so as to make possible the week-end trips, the NORTHWESTERN PACIFIC RAILROAD, the Picturesque Route of California, has issued a book called "VACATION." This book describes the garden spots and playgrounds of California in the counties in Marin, Sonoma, Mendocino, Lake and Humboldt. You can find in this book some place to suit your fancy and your purse, whether it is to fish, hunt, swim, rusticate on a farm or visit the numerous mineral springs or resorts. The issue of "VACATION 1909" is now ready for distribution and can be obtained from the NORTHWESTERN PACIFIC RAILROAD at the Ferry Ticket Office, the Up-town Office, 874 Market Street, and Room 986 (General Office), Flood Building, San Francisco, Cal.

Auto Notes

Mr. John Van Bergen has taken delivery of a 1909 four cylinder Stevens.

Mr. F. H. Bardshar has driven his light six Stevens-Duryea from San Francisco to Sisson. He reported the Pitt River Ferry not running and was compelled to go considerable distance out of his way over bad roads and through some three feet of snow, but notwithstanding all this he got through without any mishaps.

P. J. Walker who toured Europe in his Thomas sixty car last year reports making several very nice trips through Northern California within the last twenty-one days. Mr. Walker is contemplating a trip through Mexico toward the end of the season.

The automobile road over the Cuesta grade of Santa Barbara County is now completed and ready for use by autoists, according to H. A. Schoenfeld of Los Angeles who toured up to this city from his home in Los Angeles a few days ago in his Studebaker "30" touring car. Schoenfeld says the Cuesta grade will be used in the future exclusively by autoists and that all vehicles of every other description will take the lower road. This innovation will eliminate the great amount of danger which has always featured this grade as the Cuesta grade is a series of sharp turns.

W. W. Leathe has just returned from a four days tour with a party of friends in his Thomas Flyer. They toured through Santa Clara County, up around Saratoga, through Los Gatos, Pleasanton, up as far as Livermore, coming back through the old Mission San Jose and Niles. Mr. Leathe reports that the entire trip was made without mishap of any kind.

The Pioneer Automobile Company reports the following sales: H. G. Drew of Selma, an Oldsmobile; A. J. Atran an Oldsmobile; B. H. Langley a Thomas Flyer, and S. Weyant a Chalmers-Detroit "30."

Roads between here and Coalinga with the exception of the Pacheco Pass are said to be in excellent condition and exceedingly inviting to motorists. F. S. Tuttle, driver for W. S. Boggs, one of the leading oil men of the State made the run from Coalinga to this city a few days ago in Boggs' Studebaker suburban car. Despite the condition of Pacheco Pass, which is due wholly to extensive repairs which are being made on it, Tuttle made a non-stop run from the little oil town. Tuttle says that it will be some time before the Pass will be in the best shape.

Mr. Fred L. Button of Oakland came over the road from Oakland to Byron Springs via Altamont and reports the road in excellent condition. The bad stretch between Altamont and the Mountain House has been repaired so that Mr. Button states the road is in excellent condition from Oakland to the Springs.

Ethel Barrymore will be seen at the Van Ness Theatre next month in her newest success, "Lady Frederick."

Whittaker's Big Novel

It is a doubtful compliment the publishers have paid Herman Whittaker in suggesting that "The Planter" may prove "the Uncle Tom's Cabin of Mexico." "The Planter is not likely to become a factor in a fratricidal war, but it is a bigger and a better thing than the hysterical, overdrawn anti-slavery tract with its white blacks and black whites. The unnamed giant Yaqui, who leads his people to revolt and freedom is a finer figure than the platitudinous, sanctimonious negro, and though Mr. Whittaker not being a native American, may not be aware of it, the conclusion he reaches that the men who were nursed on the Declaration of Independence took most kindly to slavery as an "economic necessity" is precisely what the south claimed in its generation—that the hardest task masters the most merciless drivers, were the northerners who went south to get rich as quickly as possible. What Mr. Whittaker tells of the miserable plight of the contract laborers on the rubber plantations as well as his brief glance at the history of the Yaquis ought not to come as a complete revelation to readers who do not confine themselves to current fiction, but in throwing his facts into the form of a narrative he has crystallized general information and concentrated impressions. Decidedly "The Planter" reserves rank as one of the big books of the season. It is a pity that Mr. Whittaker has permitted himself to adopt mannerisms of style which but for the telling force with which he has handled his story would be an annoyance to his readers. However well it may be to omit particles in telegrams and cable despatches, where words count, in a plain narrative, the fewer obstacles there are to the easy reading which comes as the result of hard writing, the better. As it is "The Planter is too big a thing to have been marred by verbal nicks. Harper's have put the book forth in their usual excellent style.

OF INTEREST TO OLD SOLDIERS OF THEIR HEIRS

Certain Old Soldiers Have Land Claims Coming to Them From the Government

Any old Union Soldier or Sailor who served 90 days or longer in the late War of the Rebellion, and who went west after the war and made a homestead entry in any state in the Union for either 40, 80 or 120 acres before June 22, 1874, has a claim coming to him from the Government. It does not make any difference whether he proved up on his homestead entry or simply left it.

There are thousands of old soldiers who went to Kansas and Nebraska after the war and took up eighty acre homesteads and when the grasshoppers and hot winds came along simply left their entries and went back east. Each of these men have claims. Under a Supreme Court decision these claims are assignable. R. H. Peale, Judge Building, Salt Lake City, Utah, perfects the title to these claims and will pay the highest market price for same. If the soldier is dead the widow or heirs can sell this right. If a soldier never made an entry he has nothing to sell.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 2955 New Series, Dept. No. 9 Probate.

In the Matter of the Estate of FREDERIC GARNIER, also called FREDERICK GARNIER, Deceased.

It appearing to this Court by the petition this day presented and filed by Alexandrine Sarraille, the Administratrix of the estate of FREDERIC GARNIER also called FREDERICK GARNIER, deceased, that it is necessary to sell the whole of the real estate of said decedent to pay the debts of said decedent, and that it is for the advantage, benefit and best interests of the estate and those interested therein that a sale of the whole of the real property of the estate of said decedent and of said decedent be made,

Now therefore, it is ordered, that all persons interested in the estate of said decedent appear before this Court on Monday, the 24th day of May, A. D. 1909, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m. of that day, in the Courtroom of Department No. 9 Probate, in the Grant Building, situate at the corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, then and there to show cause why an order should not be granted said Administratrix to sell the whole of the real property of the said decedent and of the estate of said decedent.

And it is further ordered that a copy of this order be published four successive weeks next preceding said day in Town Talk, a newspaper printed and published in said City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Done in open Court this 19th day of April, A. D. 1909.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

In the Matter of the Estate of WILLIAM HALLECK DEMING, Deceased.

It appearing to this Court from the petition of Azalene E. Deming, Administratrix of the estate of WILLIAM HALLECK DEMING, deceased, that so much of the personal property of said estate particularly described in said petition as is not by law exempt from execution is of insufficient value, if sold, to pay the allowance of the family of said decedent, the debts of said decedent, and the debts, expenses and charges of administration of said estate; and it further appearing that it is necessary to sell such of said personal property as is not exempt by law from execution, and all of the real property of said decedent situate in the town of Menlo Park, County of San Mateo, State of California, particularly described in said petition, to pay the allowance of the family and the debts of said decedent, and the debts, expenses and charges of administration of said estate, and that it is for the best interests of said estate and those interested therein that a sale of so much of said personal property as is exempt by law from execution, and the whole of the real property hereinabove mentioned; and it further appearing that all persons interested in the said estate have signified in writing their assent that said real and personal property may be sold as prayed for in said petition;

Now, therefore, it is ordered that all persons interested in the estate of said decedent, WILLIAM HALLECK DEMING, appear before this Court on Monday, the 24th day of May, 1909, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m. of that day, in the Courtroom of Department No. 9 Probate of the above entitled Court, in the Grant Building, situate at the corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, then and there to show cause why an order should not be granted to said Administratrix to sell said real and personal property of said decedent.

April 21, 1909. J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Dept. No. 10, No. 20,925.

WINIFRED TRUBY, Plaintiff,
vs.
JAMES MICHAEL TRUBY, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to JAMES MICHAEL TRUBY, Defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's failure to provide plaintiff herein with any of the necessaries of life; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 20th day of January, A. D. 1909.

(Seal) H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California—Dept. 10. No. 6670.

In the Matter of the Estate of JOHN DEMARTINI, Deceased.

It appearing to this Court by the petition this day presented and filed by Flora Demartini, the Administratrix of the estate of JOHN DEMARTINI, deceased, that it is necessary to sell the whole or a portion of the real estate of said decedent in order to pay his debts and the expenses and charges of administration;

It is ordered that all persons interested in said estate appear before this Court on Monday, the 10th day of May, 1909, at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m. of that day, in the Courtroom of said Court, at the Grant Building, corner of Seventh and Market Streets, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be granted said Administratrix to sell so much of the said real estate as shall be necessary, either at public or private sale; and it is further ordered that a copy of this order be published four (4) successive weeks next preceding said date in the Town Talk, a newspaper printed and published in said City and County.

Dated, the 10th day of April, 1909.

THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge.

J. A. STEPHENS, Attorney for Administratrix,

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Dept. 10, Probate. No. 2185.

In the Matter of the Estate of IDA OLIVE HODGDON, Deceased.

Upon reading the duly verified petition of Herbert F. Hodgdon, the executor of the last will of IDA OLIVE HODGDON, deceased, and it appearing satisfactorily therefrom that it is for the advantage, benefit and best interest of the said estate and those interested therein that a sale be made of some portion thereof;

Now therefore, it is hereby ordered that all persons interested in the above entitled estate be and they are hereby directed to appear before the said Superior Court on Monday, the 10th day of May, A. D. 1909, at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m. of the said day, at the Courtroom of the said Superior Court, Department No. 10 thereof, in the Grant Building, situated at the southeast corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said executor for the sale of such real property.

And it is hereby further ordered that a copy of this order be published for four (4) successive weeks in Town Talk, a newspaper of general circulation published in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California

Dated, this 5th day of April, A. D. 1909

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 22,078.

MINA G. FLAHERTY, Plaintiff,
vs.
FRANK A. FLAHERTY, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to FRANK A. FLAHERTY, Defendant.

You are hereby directed to appear and answer the complaint in an action entitled as above brought against you in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, within ten days after the service on you of this summons—if served within this City and County; or within thirty days if served elsewhere.

And you are hereby notified that unless you appear and answer as above required, the said plaintiff will take judgment for any money or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 27th day of March, A. D. 1909. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

Constant Reader—The truth about the revolution in Turkey will not leak out for some months. The fact is that the revolution is a religious affair. Blood has been shed in Constantinople in deference to Christian missionary sentiment.

Anarchist—No, I have no prejudice against Emma Goldman. I regard her doctrines as much less harmful than those of the apostles of democracy who are now urging the people to destroy our representative form of government. There is one thing to be said for Emma Goldman: she is frank and honest and openly avows her conviction that existing institutions are prejudicial to the interests of the masses. Editor Brisbane is covertly trying to undermine our institutions by propagating the notion that the plutocratic minority is inflicting cruel injustice on the people. He never loses an opportunity to appeal to popular prejudice and inflame the passions of the multitude. With the most subtle ingenuity and by the most unscrupulous methods he has been sowing the seeds of discontent and creating a state of mind favorable to a destructive political revolution. Brisbane is the most dangerous and the cleverest mountebank that has been born since the French Revolution and Hearst is his puppet. Brisbane precipitated the Spanish war, and he is now intent upon plunging this country into a revolution. All this may be hard to believe, but familiarize yourself with his antecedents, read the preachments of his father and mother which form the gospel of his mission and then go back over the files of the Hearst papers, considering the while the gradual change of public sentiment which he has effected, and then you will appreciate the potency of the influence which he has wielded and glimpse the sinister designs by which he is animated.

FARRAND-CECILIAN
PLAYER PIANO

HERETOFORE player-pianos have either been limited to the use of only sixty-five out of the eighty-eight notes of the piano, or if they played the entire range of the piano keyboard, were such a tax upon the muscles of the legs and ankles that the fatigue of operating them was greater than the pleasure they afforded.

EVERY one knows that the really beautiful pieces of music require the entire keyboard of the piano for their proper execution and that in rewriting them to fit the sixty-five-note player much of the brilliancy of the original music had to be eliminated.

THE objectional fact that player-pianos only operated sixty-five out of the eighty-eight notes was overcome some time ago by the introduction of eighty-eight-note players, but it was only with the perfection of the eighty-eight-note Cecilian Pianos that both ease in operation and the playing of the entire keyboard were combined.

THESE eighty-eight-note Cecilian Pianos can be played either by hand, like an ordinary piano, or mechanically as a piano. All the standard sixty-five-note rolls can be played upon them, as well as the new eighty-eight-notes rolls, so that no music need be destroyed.

THE most remarkable feature of this new instrument, aside from the fact that it plays the entire keyboard, is that its player mechanism is composed entirely of metal, which is by long odds the most vital mechanical improvement ever made in piano-player construction.

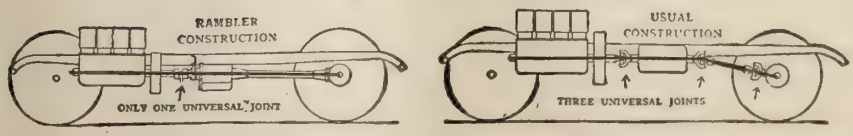
THE STRAIGHT-LINE-DRIVE



Power cannot be carried around a corner without great loss, due to friction. In the ordinary automobile much energy is wasted in transmitting the power from the engine to the rear axle through universal joints, or, in other words, around corners.

In the Rambler the driving shaft, when the load is in the car, is in direct line with the crank shaft and the angle found at one of the universal joints in most other driving systems is eliminated. The drive is thus accomplished in a direct line.

The Rambler straight-line-drive delivers the maximum power—saves energy—prevents wear—reduces cost of upkeep.

The Car with the Offset Crank Shaft

The great economy and efficiency of this car is due to such exclusive Rambler features as the Offset Crank Shaft, Straight-line-drive, Safety Spark Retarder, Rambler Spare Wheel, etc. Let us prove this to you. The Lament of the Muckrakers

"The nation is beginning to suspect that the Taft administration is to be a business administration," says that strictly business journal, the Boughten Bulletin, which solemnly and ruefully adds that the Washington correspondents are of the opinion that "big business will run the country while Taft sits quietly in the White House." In short, according to the Boughten Bulletin, Taft has made a very bad impression which he should hasten to efface. All of which is quite true. A period of peaceful and orderly government according to the old model has dawned on the country. The period of storm and stress came to an end with the exit of the spectacular agitator from the White House. When the Roosevelt Administration passed into history the country settled down to normal conditions; we returned to peace, sobriety and steady habits; we recovered from our acute tarantism and rejoiced in the complete obliteration of hysteria, quack reform and bogus strenuosity; we exulted in the prospect of an effective and permanent restoration of the common industry and productivity. Naturally the transformation has caused a bad impression on the forces of social and economic discontent that are inspired by the reckless spirit of innovation, angered by fancied grievances and inflamed by demagogic rhetoric. Government by the Constitution is most repugnant to the anarchists and mischievous mob-coddlers that masquerade as civic patriots, but we cannot sympathize with them. We can only suggest that they should cultivate the spirit of philosophy and seek consolation in the reflection that disillusionment in politics is inevitable and that when the hour of exorcism comes the reaction is generally as cruel as the ecstasy was overwrought.

The Cost of Him

The muckrakers are dying hard. They are rolling their eyes in pathetic frenzy to the expiring barks of plutophobia. Meanwhile the reactionists are rejoicing that the greatest confidence game ever played on a susceptible public is at an end. But with the glad paeans of thanksgiving are mingled doleful wails of disquietude, for the realization has come to us that for a generation we shall have to pay for the folly of indulging the morbidity of Rooseveltism. The Taft Administration inherited the greatest debt this country has faced since the civil war. It will require the very highest order of business ingenuity to master the complicated financial situation in which this country is now involved. In the circumstances should we not felicitate ourselves on having a business administration? Surely no honest and intelligent man will deplore the temporary substitution of strictly business methods for exalted professions however beneficent and inspiring. Mr. Roosevelt was like Joseph Surface in the abundance of his fine sentiments, but while affecting to regard himself as the predestined scourge of the nation he never scrupled at playing politics. On the eve of his election four years ago he sanctioned a raid on the national treasury, and millions of the people's money were abstracted to secure the old soldier vote. Criminal malfeasance of this character the good Mr. Roosevelt had no hesitation in committing in furtherance of the public good, which, in his philosophy, was always synonymous with the advancement of the Prophet's political interests. Every day there comes to light evidence of malfeasance, nonfeasance or misfeasance on the part of Theodore Roosevelt by which the people of this country suffered great pecuniary loss. Two weeks ago we learned that during Mr. Roosevelt's term he was so negligent of his duties that millions of dollars were wasted through the extravagence of men in the several bureaus and departments of the government. It has been made plain that Mr. Roosevelt utterly neglected to enforce the revenue laws or to levy and collect the Dingley tariff rates. The Finance Committee of the Senate estimates that Mr. Roosevelt's neglect of his duties pertaining to the revenue service resulted in a loss to this country of over $5,000,000 a year. Mr. Roosevelt was too busy playing politics to attend to the duties of his office, but as an expounder of moral platitudes he was without a peer. He could do everything in morals except teach by example, but with the grasp that he had on the imagination of the multitude, with the grip that he had on public credulity, it was unnecessary for him to vindicate his sincerity with anything but words. Of course we shall miss him. The people will miss him. The people missed Nero. The people mourned Nero. Indeed the people refused to believe that Nero was dead, and when an impostor appeared in the East the swinish multitude of Rome rejoiced, and yet history does not tell us that the great hero of his day, the monster who played the jockey in the arena and prided himself on the diverse accomplishments with which he tickled the popular fancy, was worthy of the affection of his countrymen.

Heresies of "Higher Education"

The man in the street, absorbed in his own personality, occupied exclusively by his own affairs, observing his fellow men merely with a passing curiosity, interested in the doings of his neighbor only when the newspapers report them as something out of the ordinary—this commonplace, conservative, custom-bound citizen knows nothing of the vast revolution that is going on about him in what is sometimes euphuistically designated "the higher intellectual strata of society." He is wholly ignorant of the forces that are operating to change what he has been taught to believe are settled conditions, to discredit his most hallowed traditions, to set a new and radical standard of right and wrong, to obliterate and annihilate, in short, the cherished ideals of modern civilization, founded, we fondly believe upon the experience and the accumulated wisdom of the ages. Yet, at this moment, in every university and college of America, as we are informed by one who has made close personal investigation, "it is being taught daily that the decalogue is no more sacred than a syllabus; that the home as an institution is doomed; that there are no absolute evils; that immorality is simply an act in contravention of society's accepted standards; that democracy is a failure and the Declaration of Independence only spectacular rhetoric; that the change from one religion to another is like getting a new hat; that moral precepts are passing shibboleths; that conceptions of right and wrong are as unstable as styles of dress; that wide stairways are open between social levels, but that to the climber children are incumbrances; that the sole effect of profligacy is to fill tiny graves; and that there can be and are holier alliances without the marriage bond than within it." When the wayfaring man shall awake from his foolish notion that wisdom is the inevitable corrollary of knowledge and that the wisdom of the schools is infallible, he will be surprised to learn that while he has been sleeping the world has been moving in a direction entirely contrary to its accustomed orbit; that the child of modernity is father to the man of an obsolete age; and that he is a back-number in the midst of his contemporaries, lagging quite superfluous on the stage of a world that has revised its morals, discarded its best traditions, repudiated its exemplary experience, and set itself determinedly with stiff-necked perversity to follow after the strangest gods that have ever been conceived by the imagination of men or invented to corrupt the understanding of the multitude. Harold Bolce, in current numbers of the Cosmopolitan, tells us that these things are being taught in all the higher institutions of learning throughout the United States—in Harvard, Yale, Princeton, the University of Pennsylvania, George Washington University, William and Mary College, the University of Chicago, Columbia University, Syracuse University, the University of California, and Stanford University. Mr. Bolce makes no deductions; he merely recites what the teachers are teaching, quoting their words, and citing their dogmas. It is a startling revelation and the wayfaring man will do well to read the record as it is here set forth, pondering its import and deciding in his own mind whether he will join the academic procession or utter his imperative protest against the heresies that are to be formulated as the orthodoxy of his children. It will be for the common citizen, cultured only in his native sense of right, educated only in the teachings of his fathers, balanced by the sane morality and the safe philosophy of experience, to decide whether he will accept for himself and his children the frenzied farrago of a lot of blithering college "professors" laboring under the delusion that they have learned to think and that they are therefore competent to direct others in the way they should think.

Lunacies of the Scholastics

It was scarcely necessary that Mr. Bolce should have taken the trouble to make personal investigation of the colleges and universities of this country. He could have obtained most of the information he has given us from the daily newspapers. The newspaper, however, does not treat the subject with sufficient gravity. Among newspapermen the college professor is regarded as something to provoke mirth and to excite derision. His utterances are only valuable when they can be made the basis of "a good story." The college professor is "news" only when he is bizarre, grotesque, fantastic, absurd. It is not the policy of the newspaper to weigh the effect of these teachings on the plastic minds of the pupils, or to predict the far-reaching and disastrous results of such teachings. If what Mr. Bolce has written or what he may hereafter write shall serve to stir a mutiny in the hearts of the people against the moral rottenness of our schools, he will not have labored in vain; and this we take it is his primary object in gathering specific examples of the sort of "education" our children are receiving in these schools. One of these examples may be quoted here as showing to what extreme the college "professor" may go in his exegetical discourse upon subjects so revolting that the mass of mankind has refused to discuss them except as pathological symptoms of an utterly depraved and incurable abnormality. Mr. Bolce tells us that Professor George B. Louis Arner, university fellow in sociology, has just prepared for Columbia University a monograph on consanguineous marriages, taking the startling ground that "it is not proved that even the closest blood-relationship between parents is directly injurious to offspring." Even "the horror of incest," he announces, "is based upon a myth." He believes that with proper restrictions, prohibiting the marriage of the diseased and degenerate, consanguineous unions might be valuable to the State. His deduction is that the reason such marriages now result so frequently in abnormal offspring is that under the ban on such alliances only the defective contract them, but that if such conjugal daring had the approval of the world, worthy and normal relatives would mate and the children would be blessed with the genius and virtue of both parents. He quotes Karl Pearson in support of the daring doctrine that "homogamy is a factor of fertility." The proponent of this horrible "doctrine" is not quite as insane as would be those who might be induced by his authority to practice "homogamy." Professor Arner of Columbia University would not marry his sister however "worthy and normal" he and she might be. Professor Arner is merely a crazy theorist who will not cross the threshold of his cloister to learn from the experts of the university's agricultural department that inbreeding of stock results in degeneration of the species and eventually destroys the productive virility of the animal. Professor Arner is one of those "cultured" lunatics who would sacrifice the vitality of the human race to perpetuate for a brief period "the genius and virtue of both parents," losing sight of the historical fact that the incest of the Ptolemys degraded the pharaohs of ancient Egypt to the level of their own eunuchs, reducing them to an effeminacy that was the scorn of the barbarian and the derision of the luxurious and pleasure-loving Persian whose vices had the merit at least of manly if brutal incentive. Professor Arner may be cited as an example in an exaggerated degree of the college theorist who promulgates "advanced doctrines" and unspeakable heresies upon sociology, economics, politics and religion. If Professor Arner and his fellow "teachers" were not members of college and university faculties; if they were ordinary citizens going about preaching their queer notions and their fool propaganda, they would be speedily consigned to the asylums provided for incurable but harmless idiots.

The Girl's Laughter

From the French of Catulle Mendes

In a village cemetery I saw a beautiful girl of about sixteen laughing like one bereft, her eyes fixed on one of the graves.

What a disagreeable sensation I experienced on seeing her thus laugh! Such merriment, contrasting with the sadness that prevailed where so many beings reposed in eternal slumber, was unnatural!

I drew near and in a tone of reproach said to her:

"Beautiful child, you would not thus laugh had you loved or even known the hapless being resting beneath these stones."

And she, looking at me with astonishment, exclaimed:

"Know him! Holy Virgin! Why, he was my lover! We would have married. I had no joys which he did not share! My thoughts were his; his hopes were mine. When his heart's beats ceased, I felt that Death cried unto me: 'Come, come!'"

"Why do you laugh, then?" I replied, subdued by the melancholy look of her eyes and by the sincere ring to her words.

"Why do I laugh, indeed? Holy Virgin! To give him pleasure! When he lived and we were sweethearts his greatest joy was to see me happy. No music pleased him more than my laughter. Cannot you comprehend how great would be his suffering did he but feel that I wept upon his grave?"

The news from France telling us that Government Ownership threatens to involve the country in a bloody revolution has given Mr. Hearst fresh inspiration. Uncle Sam in the grasp of organized labor is Mr. Hearst's favorite dream.

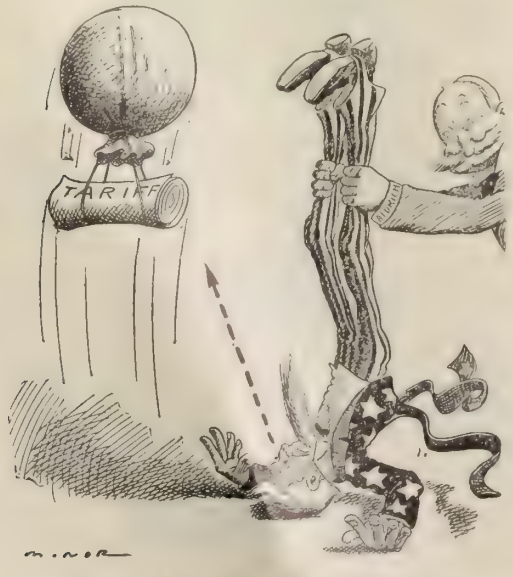
Lest we forget: This Saturday is the second anniversary of the heartrending confession of the chief of the immunity bathers, the Hon. Abe Ruef.



"It's impractical," says Supervisor Dan Murphy, speaking of the water merger designed to increase San Francisco's water supply at about one-tenth the cost of bringing water from the Sierras. Mr. Murphy can solve by intuition any engineering problem that was ever conceived, yet he is only a lawyer and learned all that he knows from the Hon. Frank J. Sullivan who is not generally known as a prodigy of erudition. It is but proper to add that Mr. Sullivan pleads guilty to his pupil.

The Rev. C. R. Brown says he is in favor of universal peace. Then he must be in favor of the recall of all missionaries.

Mr. Roosevelt is reported to have caught an unknown animal, a cross between a giraffe and a zebra. Perhaps it's the winged Hippogriff Reform.

It has not yet been ascertained whether the arrest of the Hon. James D. Phelan in Salinas for exceeding the speed limit was a "frame-up," but certain bad, rich men are under suspicion.

"The Christian missionary is the pioneer of civilization the world over," says the Call, speaking of the troublesome American missionaries in the Congo Free State. But the Congo Free State is governed by Christians who are not of the same brand of Christianity as the American missionaries. The Congo natives are being treated no worse than were the American Indians by the pioneers of civilization who established the churches that are represented in the Free State by American missionaries.

Herman Whitaker: Artist and Man

By Harry Cowell

Envious as are its eyes, it does the heart of this old world good to hear of victories won against overwhelming odds, of goals reached in spite of insurmountable obstacles, of forlorn-hope bravely at length rewarded; in brief, of hard-earned well-merited success.

Mimnermus-like, "this warm kind world is all I know" (nor do I hanker after knowledge of a warmer), and so am minded to do the best I can for its heart by telling it about Herman Whitaker.

Herman Whitaker is a success, a literary success; and seldom or never was literary success harder earned, better merited more heart-benefiting to hear.

Modest and ambitious enough to say, "I have but made a beginning!" Herman Whitaker is even now in no little danger of being known as the author of a "best seller"; which God forbid, He having designed him for nobler more-enduring fame.

Else why did He impose on him whose hands were full of the interminable duties of conscientious husband and father the further task of making himself? give him for intimate Poverty, stern friend of genius, and that in sternest of moods? ordain him to write within earshot of the mouth of growing youth that ever cries "bread!" and never "enough!" and that mouth magnified seven times, cavernous, more insatiate than the proverbial barren womb?

Great is the lure of literary success. No wonder! Hard writ is so easy read! Yet of even ten thousand who forsake all and follow Literature, not more than one succeeds. Herman Whitaker has succeeded. Neither in the lines of his mouth, nor in the knit of his brow, nor in the frankness of his nose, nor in the reserve of his eye, nor anywhere in the lexicon of his physiognomy is there such a word as fail. In short, he is your one man out of God only knows how many, and is ashamed to tell.

When first I saw him, he was easily one out of hundreds. I was lecturer, he audience. What I talked of I have forgotten—some phase of applied sociology, no doubt; the facts of the hundreds I talked to I have forgotten—the hall, the date, the occasion—everything but the Lincoln-like face of Herman Whitaker, prophetic (was it?) of The Planter, that "'Uncle Tom's Cabin' of Mexico."

Like most lecturers, I am by no means pained to see my audience pleased. Well, I think he was. Anyway, I did not go to a hotel, but home with him, swapping by the way no end of ideas, I, be sure, getting the best of the deal. My host I found full of that enthusiasm for the things of the mind characteristic of the old Greeks; this despite (or because of?) the fact that at the age of sixteen he had run away from home and opportunities for "higher education," to take the "Queen's shilling," knock about, Tommy Atkins-wise, from Billy to Jack, drift into the Canada of his Settler (where a 400-word vocabulary and none too pure serves for all needs spiritual as well as physical); thence finally westward to California, his natural home.

Well into that first night we talked; nor had our talk out. Indeed, to misquote Cory: I smile as I remember how often he and I have "tired the sun with talking and sent him down the sky."

The next morning I broke physical fast with Mrs. Whitaker, the seven mouths Solomon was too glorious to make proverbial, and the artist-at-heart who needs must clerk twelve hours a day in a grocery, in a heroic attempt to keep them from crying "more!"

Considering which twelve hours a day, not to dwell on the many devoted to household chores, the seven years which it took Herman Whitaker to give himself a better than collegiate education are loth to rise up and call him either idler or dunce. Remember it was from what Huxley calls "the larger university" that our author was graduated, whereof he subsequently had his Ph. D.

For seven years, then, Herman Whitaker, man grown, overrun by growing youth, forswore newspapers and read but to the end of mastering such books as Spencer's "First Principles," Darwin's "Origin of Species," Mill's "A System of Logic," Hamilton's "Philosophy of the Unconditioned." Five hours a day he read, and it is characteristic of the man that he read not "to himself" merely, but aloud to a blind friend, likewise bent upon a "better than collegiate education."

HERMAN WHITAKER

Hard upon his graduation, Herman Whitaker announced to Poverty and a few other intimates his intention of serving, not customers for canned corn, but the Muse; of breaking into the magazines with short-stories, and thereafter into the big publishing houses with novels. One and all advised against quitting a grocereal certainty for a literary hope; and were for putting him down as a vain fellow sore smitten with the love of the impossible. Well he knew that for any man to love the Muse is to love above his station. None the less, thanking them for their friendly advice, he informed his well-wishers that he had made up his mind to achieve the

How They Look to Mars

Being a Scientific Speculation Concerning the Impression that Some of Our Learned Savants Make Upon the Bacteriological Experts of the Planet with Which Certain Astronomers Propose to "Communicate."

By Democritus

I am pleased to note that my favorite scientist, Professor Edgar Lucien Larkin, agrees with me that it is "impossible to communicate with Mars" or any other planet, by the processes proposed by our fellow scientists. He scouts, as I scout, the chimerical scheme of Professor Pickering to construct a "reflector" from which to "flash signals to our sister planet." Professor Larkin calls attention to the circumstance that when it is noonday in Mars it is midnight on earth, and that "an electric reflector" covering an area as extensive as the State of Texas could not be seen on Mars through the intense glare of the sun. Of course not. Any scientific gent ought to know that when the sun is shining on Mars the earth is invisible to the astronomers of that planet. Is Mars visible from any of our observatories at noonday?

I was not aware, however, until so informed by Professor Larkin, that it was the plan of Professor Pickering to "communicate" by "electric reflector." I didn't discredit the great astronomer of Harvard with any such foolishness. I thought he was going to build a big heliograph and "communicate" when it was mid-day on earth and midnight on Mars. I still believe that this method of getting in touch with our red-eyed neighbor is the only feasible one until we perfect a wireless telephone that will "ring up" in Mars, or establish telepathic communication with the Martians, who are in all probability using that method of conveying their thoughts to each other in the ordinary conversations of the people.

Professor Larkin does not dispute the logical inference that Mars is inhabited by human beings closely resembling ourselves in everything except mental equipment. Neither do I; and we have been corroborated this week by that other eminent astronomer and all-round scientist, Professor Camille Flammarion. It is extremely gratifying to be confirmed in a scientific opinion or deduction by one who is such an irrefutable authority in such matters as is the greatest of living astronomers and the only scientist who may be regarded as competent to take up the work of Jules Verne where that famous man laid it down. Professor Flammarion says that Mars is not only inhabited, but that the inhabitants are already "in communication with the earth." I am not aware whether Professor Larkin is of my opinion that even if we could communicate with Mars the Martians wouldn't be able to understand the gibberish of our imperfect effort to utter ourselves intelligibly; but I am sure that he will accept my dictum that our communication would probably pass unnoticed by the scientists of Mars—as Professor Flammarion has informed us the communications of the Martians are passing unnoticed by us.

Thus it is clear to the real scientific mind that the difficulty of getting into communication with Mars is insuperable almost to the verge of impossibility. Of course nothing is absolutely impossible in the science of Professors Larkin and Flammarion and myself; but even our science has its limitations, chiefly owing to the inadequate apparatus which the scientific instrument makers have provided for us. Just now we need something that will receive the communications which Professor Flammarion says the Martians are sending to us. Not that we would be able to interpret those communications in any of our languages, but if we knew definitely that our neighbors were calling us up we could amuse ourselves trying to puzzle out what they were saying—just as we amuse ourselves puzzling over a cryptogram, or as we bend our mental energy and our ingenuity to the translation of a cipher telegram.

To my mind there is not the slightest doubt of Professor Flammarion's statement that the Martians are in "communication" with us, and I go even farther than the French scientist, in the belief that the Martians are as well informed regarding what is happening on this sphere as we are ourselves. No doubt the Martians have been in communication with us for centuries; they have studied the queer life forms and the eccentric habits of the inhabitants of this earth, as microscopists study the infusoria or note the movements and structure of microbes. I have no doubt that the Martian scientists are as intellectually superior to the scientists of the earth (with the possible exception of Professor Larkin, Professor Flammarion and myself) as our miscroscopists are to the insects that they watch through their lenses and tubes. Do the microscopic scientists try to "communicate" with the bugs in the hope or expectation that the bugs will "communicate" with the superior intellect at the objective of the microscope? Imagine a typhoid bacillus getting into "communication" with an investigating bacteriologist through the tube of a microscope! Yet such a possibility is no more absurd than would be a "communication" between Benjamin Ide Wheeler, for one example, or David Starr Jordan for another, with a freshman student in any of the scientific departments of the universities of Mars.

Suppose a bacillus of the measles, which is the most intelligent of microbes, should be able to "communicate" through the microscope with Dr. Edward Robeson Taylor—is it probable that Dr. Edward Robeson Taylor would be able to comprehend what the measle-bug was trying to "communicate" aside from the disease he carries in the poison sac of his proboscis? Yet Dr. Edward Robeson Taylor is one of our most learned scientists, ranking with Benjamin Ide Wheeler and David Starr Jordan in versatility of genius and all-roundaboutedness of scientific lore. If Benjamin Ide Wheeler could write poetry and if David Starr Jordan knew as much law as does Professor Boke, there would be no differentiation of intellectual acquirement and native ability between Wheeler, Jordan and Taylor. President Wheeler probably knows as much about medicine as does Dr. Taylor, and Dr. Taylor probably is as conversant with ichthyology as is President Jordan; and these are probably as competent in the science of municipal politics as is Dr. Taylor. I would not say that Dr. Taylor could read Sophocles in the original as fluently as does President Wheeler; nor would I assert dogmatically that our honored Mayor could compete with Dr. Jordan in exact knowledge of the effect of Vina brandy on the human system; but these are minor and wholly non-essential differences, and do not materially disturb my original proposition that if all three were poets and lawyers or poetical lawyers there would be no difference whatever between these men upon an intellectual and scientific basis.

Pardon

Translated from the Spanish of Emila Bazan

"Surely I have seen this chain before," murmured Maese Lamberto, the old jeweler, as he turned it over and over with his deft fingers.

The girl who had brought the chain into the little Florentine shop stood smiling as the old man scrutinized the complicated design and exquisite workmanship. She was a beautiful creature, with features as perfect as those of Bellini's Madonnas. Presently she opened her chatelaine bag and took from it a superb medallion of St. George.

"This, signor, is the pendant of the chain, said she.

As his eye lit upon it, the face of the old jeweler changed and he turned upon his fair patron a glance of suspicion and accusation as though to penetrate to the very depths of her heart and tear forth its innermost secrets. The girl seemed astonished at his expression, but remained calm and smiling, without the slightest trace of anxiety in her lustrous eyes. Maese Lamberto was a Florentine, and at the sight of her faultless beauty there came over him a deep sense of admiration that was both involuntary and overpowering, though he had almost reached the age of dotage. He studied the oval outlines of that fair face, the arched forehead, the delicately chiseled nose, the lips as translucently crimson as the shells of the Adriatic, the dainty throat, the well-turned shoulder and the perfect bust, then, reasoning like the esthetic Florentine that he was, he concluded: "Impossible that such a one should be the accomplice of thieves."

Still holding in his hand the medallion of St. George, he said aloud:

"Who gave you this locket and chain?"

"They were presents from my betrothed, given me on the day of our betrothal," she answered proudly.

"What is his name?"

"Amadeo Cenzoli."

The old man again turned over in his mind the pages of the past. No, this was not the name of his rascally nephew who had disappeared, taking with him everything of value that the jeweler possessed and everything that had been left in his keeping, leaving him penniless in his old age, and compromising his reputation almost beyond redemption. From that fatal morning when the robbery had been discovered, Maese Lamberto had denied himself all comfort and had toiled like a slave, even by candle light, in an effort to pay for the loss of the jewels that had been deposited with him. Under the strain of this long continued labor his eyes had already begun to grow dim and his body was bent. Even so, he was not yet quite free from the burden of his debts, and it would take several years more, despite the fact that the Duke of San Miniato had relieved him of all responsibility for his pearl necklace and for the girdle of bells that had been worn by his jester.

It had become a regular occurrence for the old jeweler to accost the duke each time that he passed through the piazza and to utter the same hoarse exclamations, the same cry for vengeance, the outpourings of his oppressed soul: "Have you caught the scoundrel? Shall we never punish the villain? Does Justice sleep, most noble duke?" Then the duke would promise to renew his efforts and to bring the thief to justice, even though he were hidden in the very bowels of the earth. The truth was, however, that politics, preparations for war, troubles with the Pope, the French, and the Venetians, the violent factional feuds which caused daily bloodshed in the streets of Florence, commercial activities and social pleasures left the duke no time to think of petty thieves or their pursuit, and besides it was of but slight consequence to a great noble whether a humble jeweler such as Lamberto were ruined or not. Let him find the culprit himself and the authorities would see him properly hanged. One life more or less in a time of such confusion and amid a life of such feverish activity as that of the duke; pshaw, what was the difference! Then the duke, followed by his great greyhound, would shrug his shoulders and pass on, leaving the old man to cry for vengeance.

And now Maese Lamberto had found, or at least thought he had found, a clue that would lead to the discovery of that accursed rascal. Repressing his first impulse, he bethought himself of the need of caution. Perhaps the thief had changed his name. He must gather more facts. Turning one more to the maiden, he remarked affably:

"Your betrothed has indeed given you a beautiful chain, and I shall repair it for you so cleverly that the flaw will never be noticed. Is the young man handsome?"

"To me he seems very handsome. His hair is like gold. His face is slightly pale. His eyes are of a grayish green like the water of the river Arno."

"Doubtless he is young?"

"He cannot be over twenty-five years old."

Again Maese Lamberto trembled with agitation. Every detail of the description coincided with that of his infamous nephew.

Have you been betrothed long?"

"A year and eleven months."

The old man's blood boiled. It had been just a year and eleven months since the date of the robbery.

"Has he ever given you any other presents?" he asked, in order to make the evidence still more complete.

"Oh, yes, a great many," replied she, with a triumphant smile. "He gave me a pearl necklace, a diamond brooch, an eagle of gold studded with emeralds, a bracelet, and countless ornaments of silver. He bought all these beautiful things on his travels through Italy and France." The proof was complete! These were the very objects, and the nephew had indeed traveled both in Italy and France for his uncle, on affairs of business.

"Where does your betrothed live now?"

"Where else should he live but near me! He dwells in the village of San Giovanni, and is chief gardener to the Duke of Miniato."

In the household of the duke! Now Maese Lamberto's vengeance was assured. Tomorrow morning he would be seized, bound and dragged to prison. Then would come the trial, the torture and the execution.

"Does he know that the chain is broken? It would be better if he did not know, for it might make him angry."

"Of course he does not know, nor shall he ever know. Have the kindness to repair it secretly, lest he might think I do not sufficiently prize his presents. And I do prize them, yes, more than all the world, and more than myself. It is as though I were bewitched. I love him so. In the village everyone calls me 'la innamorata.'"

As she spoke, she leaned toward the feeble old man, and the light of her ardent passion flashed in her beautiful eyes. This time the admiration of Maese Lamberto carried him into new realms of thought. Into the slumbering ashes of age had fallen a spark, and he felt the blood course through his veins as it had not done since the days of his own youth. Then he closed his eyes and tried to forget his decrepitude. With a sigh of mingled sorrow and regret, he gently laid the chain in his great walnut chest.

A few days later the duke passed his door and, surprised at the calmness of the shopkeeper, asked if there were any clue to the thief, adding facetiously:

"We have purchased a fine new rope for the hangman."

The old man shook his head.

"I no longer wish to find him, most noble duke. Perhaps it is a higher power that has intervened to change my will. Who knows but I should have done the same at his age!"

The Spectator

Didn't Know the Fathers

It is a wise child that knows its father, and the children of the Athenian Club of Oakland are not wise; they have clean forgotten the fathers of the club, and its traditions are to them as a memory of the wind that cooled their heated brows last summer. Charlie Yale, who is one of the founders of the club, wandered into the place the other day after a long absence and scanning the walls vainly in search of familiar faces that once hung there, asked the Secretary, who was born since the club was organized, where those pictures had been "stored." The Secretary said he didn't know, but he thought perhaps they might have been taken "to the garret." At the behest of Yale the Secretary guided him to that repository of forgotten things and there he found a dilapidated painting of the first presidents of the club in a group, and another picture, frameless, upon which was painted the legend "The Dam Litrary Fellows," containing sketches of the newspapermen who were once members of the club and in their day the most valued of the club's assets as material for the entertainments that helped to make the club famous in its earlier history. Yale pointed at one of the former presidents:

"Who is that?" he asked.

"I don't know," the Secretary answered.

"Well, that is Billy Foote," Yale explained. "Ever hear of Billy Foote?" The Secretary said he had heard of Foote. Yale indicated another of the ancient presidents:

"Who is that?" he inquired.

"I don't know," said the Secretary.

"That is Dr. E. H. Woolsey," said Yale, his indignation rising by leaps and bounds; "ever hear of Dr. Woolsey?" The Secretary thought he had heard somebody speak of Dr. Woolsey.

"And this one, I suppose you don't know this President of the Athenian Club?" No, the Secretary didn't recognize that face.

"That," said Yale, scarcely able to suppress his growing wrath; "that is C. O. Alexander—he died when you were in knickerbockers, probably." Then turning to the "dam literary fellows" he questioned the new-born Secretary concerning the men who had made the club famous

"Do you know that one?" he asked.

"Never saw him in my life," the Secretary responded.

"I suppose not," Yale rejoined; "well, that is Johnny Lathrop, who did more than any other man toward founding this club."

"Here's another, do you know him?" And Yale directed a trembling finger at the most distinguished-looking man in the group.

"Don't know him," the Secretary confessed.

"Of course not," sputtered Yale; "of course not. That's Ed Hamilton; ever hear of Ed Hamilton?" The Secretary said he had never heard of Hamilton.

"Never heard of Ed Hamilton!" the old clubman exclaimed with pitying intonation in which sarcastic rebuke mingled as oil of aloes with wine of Cyprus. "Sic transit, gloria mundi," he muttered between his teeth, quoting from the little Latin surviving from his schooldays, to prevent the utterance of shorter and uglier words. Turning again to the group of presidents he asked the Secretary if he recognized another of the ancients. The Secretary shook his head negatively.

"Look at me," commanded Yale. The Secretary obeyed and a gleam of intelligence and recognition overspread his countenance.

"Why, that's you," he cried, with a semi-joyous laugh.

"Yes, that's me," Yale sneered. "I'm glad you have managed to get acquainted with one of us. Do you know that one?" pointing at another of the group. Again the Secretary announced his ignorance; whereupon Yale could contain himself no longer:

"Mr. Secretary," he said in accents that cut like a knife; "you are about as fit to be an officer of this club as the janitor would be. This portrait which you fail to recognize among the former presidents of the Athenian club, was once a member of Congress from this district, a Secretary of two departments of the national government, and one of the most distinguished members of the club at the present time—that is Victor Metcalf and he is down stairs now playing dominoes." Saying which the indignant first President of the club stumped out of the garret and out of the building declaring that he would never come back.

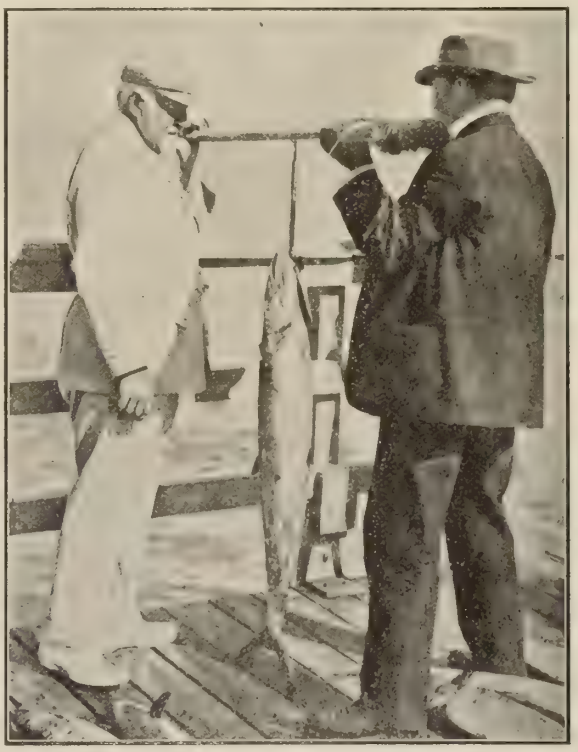
Aunt and Nephew to Wed

The report that H. E. Huntington is about to marry his uncle's widow remindes me that at the time of his divorce it was rumored that dissensions in his family arose about the time of the prospect of a contest over C. P. Huntington's estate. It will be remembered that Princess Hatzfeldt, the adopted daughter of the railroad magnate, was dissatisfied with the will, and that when she threatened to involve the estate in litigation a question arose as to whether the forms of law had been complied with when Huntington adopted her. She was the niece of Huntington's first wife, and related to H. E. Huntington's wife. Now, according to rumor, Mrs. H. E. Huntington espoused the cause of the Princess and H. E. Huntington, loyal to the memory of his uncle, gave his support to the widow. A contest was averted, but the domestic rupture followed. And now it is said that a sentimental attachment is the outcome of the complications precipitated by the Princess. Mrs. C. P. Huntington is one of the wealthiest women in America, and it will be fortunate for Los Angeles if she decides to make the Southland her home. She is a philanthropic woman and she is possessed of many graces of mind and person. Though she has passed her fiftieth year, Time has been kind to her, permitting her to retain the appearance of a woman of forty. C. P. Huntington was her second husband. Her son, Archer, the offspring of her first marriage, was born when she was only fifteen years old. He is now a man of exceptional culture with a passion for literary pursuits, and he is an authority on Spanish literature and art. His researches have won him recognition and honor from the Spanish Government. His wife is also of literary bent, and she has written a great deal of verse, some of which reveals a dainty touch and real poetic sensibility. The following is a sample of her workmanship, it is entitled "Old Age:"

I have finished the rose days of love,
And the white days of youth,
I have come by the road of Desire
To the grey land of Truth.



And the laughter and anguish are one
In the shadow of sleep,
And I murmur of love—"Did I blush?"
And of pain—"Did I weep?"

The Municipal Campaign

It seems opportune to remark that the people of this city will be vastly benefited as the result of any arrangement that will give them an honest mayor with freedom to act in accordance with the dictates of his conscience and a disposition to perform his duties without squinting at the grandstand. The probability of the making of such an arrangement, however, is somewhat remote. The politicians that concern themselves with shaping the political fate of this municipality are less eager to elect a good mayor than they are to elect a good dog. So far the only candidate who has effected anything in the nature of organization is Coroner Leland who appears to have the inside track in Democratic politics. Chief among Dr. Leland's political assets is popularity. He is a good assimilator and a good mixer, and it is said that he enjoys the confidence of the McNab faction as well as the friendship of some of McNab's enemies. But his position is somewhat embarrassing as it may become necessary for him to conciliate the Hickey-Fay-Phelan coterie of pseudo-reformers. Dr. Leland, being a wise politician, realizes the importance of avoiding entangling alliances, and doubtless he does not relish the prospect of going before the people as the choice of the unsavory clique that now has its grip on the municipal government. Thus far the pseudo-reformers have not committed themselves, but at a conference of Dr. Leland's friends the other day District Attorney Langdon said he was willing to get behind the Coroner provided he received assurance of sympathy with the graft prosecution. It is understood that to prove his sympathy Dr. Leland must consent to run on a ticket with the Spreckels choice for district attorney.

Premature Aspirations

Apparently Tim Sullivan's protege, Mr. Crocker, the unattached business man, was trotted out for the campaign prematurely. When he was first announced it was believed that he had been slated for the job by the powers that be, but all efforts to work up enthusiasm in his behalf proved futile. It soon became evident that the only recognized fount of enthusiasm had not been uncorked. Mr. Crocker is still in a receptive attitude, but his friends are not squandering any emotion on his prospects. He is said to be a very nice gentleman with some good fraternal connections and many of the attributes essential to successful achievement in public office, but he has not yet received any assurance of the favor of the Republican machine, which is a mighty delicate and perishable article. This favor is never distributed recklessly, but rather where it may be likely to do the most good. This year there is some talk of a combination between the Republican and Labor machines, a combination that would insure the dispersion of the pestiferous patriots that have had this community by the ears for two years. In union labor circles there has been revolt against the leaders who have been trafficking with the Phelan-Spreckels-Older cabal, which is now pretty generally regarded as the inspiration of the iniquitous car strike, and there is consequently a strong sentiment among labor politicians in favor of a combination with the Republicans.

Mutt Goes to New York

"Bud" Fisher, creator of Mutt, pictorial biographer of Beany, Tobasco and other illustrious protagonists of an obsolete drama has gone where all good California cartoonists go—to New York. He was summoned hence by William R. Hearst to join the staff of the New York Journal, and he went, I am told, without regret, for his spirit was somewhat saddened when the founder of the Independence Leg, in a state of panic induced by the uproar at the time of the Heney shooting, ordered a cessation of the amusing series of cartoons on the current phases of the graft prosecution. About that time the Examiner lost many readers who were disgusted with the political buncombe which shrieked from the pages of that journal and weary of the mountebankish antics of the proprietor. Also about that time the Spreckels cabal was vigorously but vainly proselytizing in the interest of the Spreckels journals, and the Chronicle, without any fuss, pursuing the only sane policy in local daily journalism, was picking up Examiner subscribers by the hundreds. The noise made by the Spreckels cabal gave Hearst the impression that the wholesale defection was the result of the Mutt pictures, and he wired out a hurry order for the burial of Beany and his ridiculous confreres, thus depriving the Examiner of the only leaven of intelligence that might have compensated for much of the stupidity which has become a characteristic of latter day journalism. So with the races at an end and the embargo on Beany, Crawler et al., Fisher was beginning to feel the need of a new inspiration when the summons came from Hearst. He left town last Sunday, but before going he turned out a supply of Mutt pictures for immediate use. The original drawings of the prosecution cartoons he distributed as mementoes among his friends. These mementoes are to be published between book covers for the purpose of perpetuating the memory of some of the great heroes of the great bunko game.

The Rebuking of a Muckraker

Justice Shaw of the Supreme Court was introduced in Los Angeles not long ago to a gentleman of the name of Connolly. "I am pleased to meet you," said Justice Shaw, and he shook hands with Mr. Connolly.

Then suddenly it occurred to him that perhaps he had shaken hands with an undesirable acquaintance.

"I'm not sure I caught your name," he said. "Is it Connolly?"

"Yes, that's my name," said the man.

"Connolly of Collier's Weekly?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then," said Justice Shaw, "I am not glad to meet you. In fact, I don't want to know you," and with a look of scorn on his face he turned away. The snubbed muckraker was so astonished that he could not utter a word; nor could he conceal his emotion. His face was in a blaze. Good for Justice Shaw! Connolly is one of the many muckrakers who came to this city at the solicitation of our civic patriots to aid in the propagation of slanders against the courts that would not acquiesce in the prostitution of justice. He inspired most of the misrepresentation that was circulated by Collier's Weekly for the gratification of the hypocritical rogues who have been conducting our moral uplift.

Time-Servers of the Bench

The judges of our Supreme Court and District Court of Appeal have suffered much at the hands of conscienceless journalists, and doubtless toward those who have cruelly maligned them they have a strong feeling of resentment. In the circumstances it would be interesting to know what their sentiments are with respect to those members of the judiciary that give their moral support to the sources of villification. With the exception of Dunne and Lawlor there is probably not a judge on the bench in San Francisco in the Federal or State Courts, who is not conscious of the outrages committed in the name of Justice by the attorneys of the graft prosecution, or who is not sensible of the absolutely unwarranted and cruel nature of the criticism to which the appellate judges have been subjected. Yet we know that there are several judges, who, moved by political considerations, have given countenance in a social way to the men that have wantonly besmirched the bench. We have seen their names in the list of those present at a function given under the auspices of an auxiliary of the infamous propaganda, an organization, the avowed purposes of which are in conflict with the fundamentals of American justice. Are not these time-servers of the judiciary worse than the coarse and illiterate muckrakers who were imported to aid in the propagation of slander? Surely there is not a vast difference between the bird that fouls its own nest and these judges who court the favor of venomous slanderers of the judiciary and implicitly sanction the employment of intimidation as an aid to justice. Obviously these judges care naught for the reputation of the bench; nor is it likely that they are much concerned for the welfare of the State. They know how important it is that the courts should have the confidence of the people; they know the disadvantage under which judges labor when unjustly attacked and villified, and yet they cultivate the friendship of men who have spitefully traduced the highest courts of this State. I hope that when Justice Cooper meets any of these time-servers of the bench he will administer a rebuke quite as forceful as the one that reddened the cheeks of muckraker Connolly.

Judge Dunne's Visit

Judge Dunne, who was enjoying a vacation while Judge Mahon was trying Luther Brown on a charge of kidnapping Fremont Older in the court where Dunne usually sits, walked into the court where Judge Lawlor is trying Patrick Calhoun on a charge of offering a bribe to Fred P. Nicholas, and after shaking hands with Special Prosecutor Heney, climbed up on the bench beside Judge Lawlor. It was a visit of courtesy and it was but natural that Judge Dunne should extend that courtesy to the representative of the District Attorney and Rudolph Spreckels. He made no effort to shake hands with any of the attorneys for the defense because he probably thought that none of them desired the pleasure of his acquaintance. Anyway, Judge Dunne didn't even look at the attorneys for the defense, but went straightaway to the seat of the mighty and from that eminence looked out over the courtroom with a pleased expression as if he was happy to be there and didn't care who knew it. Judge Lawlor greeted him with becoming dignity and adjourned court five minutes ahead of time that day so that he could enjoy the companionship of his old and dear friend the longer. It is even suspected that they went to luncheon together.

When Olives Were Ripe

I speak in irony when I say that Judge Dunne and Judge Lawlor are "old and dear friends." They are nothing of the sort. They have been friends only since that memorable midnight when they met to give judicial cognizance to the fake immunity which the District Attorney granted to the boodling supervisors. Before that Judge Dunne and Judge Lawlor were mortal enemies. It was their habit to allude to each other in terms of derision and scorn. It was largely owing to the contempt that each had for the other and the freedom with which each gave utterance to his personal impressions that the reputation of both was established in certain circles long before that memorable midnight meeting. Out of the gossip that circulated in consequence of this mutual aversion Budd Fisher obtained much of the material that gave piquancy to his caricatures when he was making the town laugh at Finished and Crawler and Beany and Tobasco. The general public which had never heard of Judge Lawlor's boon companion, "Tasso," was quite in the dark concerning Fisher's allusion. The point of the olive story was appreciated only by those who frequented Peter Dunne's saloon or discussed Lawlor in those days with the brother of Peter Dunne, who, at that time, had no affection for the illustrious epicure. But the times change and men change with them. A community of interest in the "graft prosecution" brought the two judges together, and they have been together ever since. So it happened that the other day Judge Dunne called upon his brother jurist, and after shaking hands with their common friend, the special prosecutor, sat down beside the friend of "Tasso" and afterwards accompanied him to a lunch which began with a relish of olives and ended with Judge Lawlor's interpretation of section 1073 of the Penal Code. I wonder what has become of "Tasso." Perhaps the poundman got him.

When Our Dead Awaken

One fine night of the Lang Ago, the greatest of all critics was seduced into becoming the papa of a spring poem. It was a weakling, yet (or rather, therefore) he loved it better than all his virile prose offspring put together. But other Spartan critics exposing it, the poor thing came to an untimely (?) end. Then it was that St. Beuve took Sir Philip Sidney's advice, and wrote these memorable words: In the heart of every man, be he ever so prosaic, is entombed a dead poet! Every now and then an occasion arises for the raising of these dead poets and the hair of the gentle reader. Like the blare of the last trumpet, the centenary of Edward Fitzgerald, I am told, brought to life so many of the inadequately entombed as to cause the editors of literary journals the world over to imagine that the Day of Judgment was upon them. Despite Christian Science and the optimist at large, no modern poet has voiced the innermost thoughts of the age in a way to be for a moment compared with that of the sincerely flattered but inimitable Omar of old. So much for the prosy apology. I will now open my heart to you, and let its waked one gibber his "Imitations of Immorality," wherein you will do well to recognize the ghost of poetry.

Like silver waters laving Love's white feet,
Life flows away, nor is one whit less fleet;
Or e'er Love cry "I'm kissed!" the lips are fled;
The bitter seas absorb the runnels sweet.

Love's white feet, think you they are standing still?
Nay, fool! they're flowing even as the rill
That kisses but in passing. So they pass,
While passions foam against them, strange and chill.

Flow flesh and spirit, yet a man will say,
Unbraiding, "But you loved me yesterday!"
You? You were other then, and other he:
New sweet, or none—the old is swept away!

There is no old, but only ever-new,
Which masquerades in guise of "Me" and "You."
And Love, that molts his feathers as he flies,
To names alone can possibly be true.

"I love you!" cannot hold the fleeting fast:
Becomes "I loved you!" "You" and "I" are past.
Another I may love another you
And stand at our false faithfulness aghast.

In days engulfed, when first our love began,
You loved not me! Forestall the Fates, who can?
The girl that was your mother did but love
The boy that was the father to this man.

Remote ancestor, what to me his fears?
Hopes? smiles? successes? struggles? failures? tears?
There's many a man I know more like me now
That I am like myself of yester-years!

Yet memories of the memories of his sins
Hale me to where each memory begins;
Though what he did I could nor do nor dream,
His misdeeds prick me like so many pins.

Ah, foolish love! why dream of others, when
You ne'er can kiss the selfsame me again?
Nor ever I the yester-you? nor keep
The golden Now from passing into Then?

of the Boughten Bulletin. Nothing doing! The palladiums of our liberties, ever vigilant, are apparently unconscious of the efforts of an American citizen to bring two blacklegs of journalism before the bar of justice. The vociferous heralds of truth have been stricken dumb by the spectacle of one of the plain people in an attitude of hostility toward two journalistic purveyors of venomous slander. You can find all about the latest scandal in high life in the columns of our virtuous dailies; you can get all the news of the police courts and the slums; but not a word is to be found with reference to the struggles of Fremont Older and Tartuffe Crothers to avoid a trial before an impartial judge. Having persuaded a Kern County judge to call in a judge from another county they then urged that judge to transfer the case to some other county, hoping, perhaps, to get the case by easy stages into the hands of Judge Dunne and through him into the hands of a programmer. Last Saturday Judge Norton of Stockton, to whom the case had been referred by the Kern County jurist, announced that he would not transfer the case beyond the bounds of the county, whereupon it was said that a writ of mandamus would be applied for. Nothing about this in any of the dailies. Nor has the League of Justice as yet taken cognizance of this juggling with justice. Nor has Professor Boke, who is zealous for the truth in journalism, protested against the suppression of the news, which, of course, is just as bad as distorting the news. Have the plain people no interest in all this? Is it not somewhat startling to the average citizen, who certainly knows something of the importance of personal liberty, to learn that the freedom of the press is thus abused? There can be no greater tyranny than that which is exercised by the press. The newspapers invade the privacy of the home; there can be no liberty where the power of the press is unrestrained. Yet we find that in furtherance of their power the newspapers of San Francisco have banded together for mutual protection against the victims of their tyranny and their injustice, and that by reason of this agreement any newspaper may without fear of exposure seek to intimidate judges and trample on the rights of citizens.

"Hello, Freeman! Who are you working for now?"
"Same people—a wife and five children."

Helped by Its Enemies

The Evening Globe of this city announces that it is compelled by phenomenal increase of circulation and advertising patronage, to order a new sextuple press with a capacity of 75,000 sixteen-page papers per hour, which will be installed in their new plant on Market street. The success of the Globe is due to many local conditions, some of which are comprised within the terse explanation of the Globe itself, "The enemies we have made." It is true that the Globe has many enemies, but without exception they are also the enemies of the community. Among them are Rudolph Spreckels, James D. Phelan and the protagonists of the "graft prosecution," including the morning and evening organs of that aggregation of hypocrites, pharisees, venal scribes, charlatans, sycophants, fakers, pretenders, thugs, bullies, crooks, and fools. The Globe has already exposed many of the schemes and false pretenses of this delectable bunch of puritans, reformers and pseudo-patriots; and the work goes on amid the furious clamor of the opposition who have not hesitated to use physical violence in the effort to stop the verbal assault of a newspaper that is absolutely fearless of consequences in its campaign against these filibusters of "reform" and their allied pirates of the Spreckels-Phelan plunderbund. Denunciation, recrimination, vituperation, threats, curses, insults, blows, lies, libel suits, treacherous attack and cowardly assault have been some of the answers of the "graft prosecution" to the Globe's exposes and criticisms; but in spite of this bushwhacking and jayhawking of the prosecution guerrilas the newspaper has prospered beyond the expectation of the owners—the promoters of the enterprise say that their success is in a large measure due to "persistent advertising" they have received from their antagonists. My own opinion is that the Globe's popularity is the result of a complete revulsion of public sentiment upon the questions involved in this quarrel and the public realization that the men who have brought this turmoil and dissension into the community are self-seeking hypocrites conspiring with every base element of the community, masking their sinister, revengeful and mercenary purposes under a pretense of civic virtue and high moral incentive. Whatever may be the dominant reason for the Globe's unparallelled success, it is certain that the newspaper has achieved one object of its existence— it has thrown a fierce searchlight into the dark places of the city and revealed the motives of a conspiracy more deadly to the welfare of San Francisco than any which these conspirators pretend they are now endeavoring to thwart and punish for the common good.

The Geary Street Outrage

The Examiner has been "pointing with pride" to the fact that it is entirely responsible for the present status of the Geary street road. According to this journalistic champion of the plain people its stentorian protest was what deterred the Supervisors some years ago from selling the Geary street franchise to the highest bidder. It strikes me as somewhat curious that the Examiner should so ardently lay claim to sole responsibility for the prodigious damage that has been done to property from one end of Geary street to the other. At the same time it seems to me symptomatic of imbecility that the Examiner, now that it is making so desperate a struggle to regain lost prestige, should be enraging the taxpayers of the city by urging that an additional bonded debt be contracted for the purpose of experimenting in municipal ownership. And while pondering the Examiner's alarming manifestations I marvel at the apathy of Geary street property owners; also, I marvel at the courage (or is it the cowardice of the Supervisors?), who are trifling with the people in this matter. I will remind them of the fate of Tom Johnson of Cleveland, whose worst defeats occurred two weeks ago at an election on the proposal to issue bonds for the various public improvements and the erection of a municipal tuberculosis hospital. Both propositions were beaten. Last year Mayor Johnson was defeated on the street railway referendum. "Tom" Johnson has experienced the force of reaction against radicalism in municipal government which is not confined to Ohio. The people of Cleveland have learned from experience that municipal ownership is buncombe. Incidentally, they have learned that a three-cent fare under the new regime, which means one cent additional for each transfer, is higher than the five-cent fare of the pre-Johnson days.

Where All is Pure and Clean

Detective William J. Burns was in New York the other day. Here him talk through the medium of the Sun: "The whole San Francisco graft mess has been cleaned out and the place disinfected. We have every hope of convicting Schmitz again." Far from the scene of his triumph the Sejanus of the modern Caesarian dispensation revels in the luxury of lying with impunity. New York has not yet heard of the new graft mess in San Francisco,—the grafting of the Burns family and of Burns's witnesses on the city's payroll. Burns took occasion while in New York to dissent from the statement made by Heney in Philadelphia on January 1st to the effect that E. H. Harriman "was primarily responsible for the system of graft in San Francisco." "Burns believes," we are told, "that Harriman was a victim of conditions and was only to be blamed for yielding to them." This is a somewhat remarkable change of front in view of the strenuous efforts that were made to indict Harriman. At the inception of the graft prosecution it was fondly hoped by our civic patriots that they would be able to present the dripping head of Harriman to that other practical man the Hon. Theodore Roosevelt. Nothing was said in those days with reference to conditions over which a higher-up had no control. The higher-ups, we were told, made conditions. The higher-ups were so eager to be held up that they seduced the innately honest but susceptible Supervisors. But evidently it has since been ascertained that of all the higher-ups, the one innocent victim of conditions was the pure and holy genius of the Southern Pacific system.

Organized Publicity

That some part of California is sure to suit every individual is the firm belief of every Californian, and none are more thoroughly convinced of it than those who know the State best. It has been the idea of every enthusiastic developer to bring about such a condition that each visitor shall become a resident, but the practical difficulty has been to devise some plan by which strangers could be made acquainted with all sections without the necessity and expense of visiting each. In brief, what was wanted was a "you push the button and we'll do the rest" device, very simple once the machinery was in place and the button located. The recent meeting of the Counties Committee of the California Promotion Committe has put into working order as near a substitute for the push button as can be devised. To begin with, these meetings of the Counties Committee have virtually eliminated the old feeling of sectionalism, and all parts of the State are now working in harmony and unison. This was a long step in the right direction, for, whether it be state or village, there is nothing so discouraging to new inhabitants as the exhibition of neighborhood dissension. The next stride was taken when at the Del Monte meeting the Committee on Tourists in California suggested the plan of having every one of the two hundred local organizations provided with a cabinet containing literature concerning every other part of the State. The California Promotion Committee has undertaken to carry out the suggestion and the practical work is already well under way. Through this plan, if a man who arrives in any district is not pleased with the surroundings and prospects he will not be permitted to depart unsatisfied and to judge the whole commonwealth as unsuited to his needs, but he will be at once supplied with literature concerning every other part, and the effort will be made to please him so well that he will be induced to become a resident somewhere within the confines of California. With the California Promotion Commitee as the State Central Organization, acting as a sort of clearing house, these cabinets will be kept filled, and the rivalry between the different sections will be able to expend itself in each endeavoring to get out the most convincing literature in the most attractive form.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks.—The prediction made by a leading steel man on the position of the United States Steel corporation for this year in regard to earnings, financing improvements, and possibilities of the common stock is significant and worthy of attention. His statement concedes the bonding of the plant at Duluth and Gary and that the earnings of the corporation this year will be on a large scale, and, finally, that the Common will be placed on a five per cent basis the coming fall; hence the recent heavy inside buying of this security may be expected; also, and that a slow and heavy improvement may be looked for during the coming months. What pertains to the position in steel is true of nearly every other line of trade and as the period advances for crop growing the security market will respond to favorable conditions very rapidly. We are of the opinion that in the market in the recent week that values have forged ahead too fast and that a readjustment is again due of the speculative position in Wall Street; hence a set-back early the coming week may be expected.

Wheat.—There was remarkable action in wheat prices every day of the week. As early as Tuesday, July sold at 112, later the same day at 117 7-8; two days later broke to 113 1-2; on Friday, recovered to 117 3-4 same day, broke to 114 on Saturday and closed with a small rally that figured about 2 1-2c higher than last quotation of the week previous. Late in the week there was decided strength in the later months. The early days of the week brought world's shipments of over 8,000,000, larger northwest receipts day after day, and low prices were made under these statistics. Good cash business set in and amounted to 100,000 to 200,000 bushels a day up to Thursday. Bradstreets decreased world's visible 8,000,000 bushels. State reports from Ohio, Oklahoma and Michigan showed low condition of growing crop. Somewhat serious dry weather developed over the southwest. This kind of news, together with the anticipation of the Washington crop report due on Friday started a big wave of buying, which resulted in the high prices. Before the crop report was received a sinking sort of market created uneasiness among the local buyers, especially the pyramiders and bear leaders, who, seeing the situation in the pit, indulged in some heavy selling which started a break of about four cents a bushel in a few minutes. The market had made partial recovery when official crop figures were given out. They were interpreted as bullish and the market quickly showed four cents upturn from the low point of the hour before. Many good judges of crop conditions are of the opinion that the present method of calculating the crop promise on a basis of 17 busheds or over as par, is too high. They are anticipating a final yield of winter wheat of approximately 375,000,000 bushels. It is generally conceded that there can be no more cheap wheat prices in this country until production overtakes consumption and export demands, and this being the case the situation continues strong commercially regardless of the unsettled feeling of the trade at the close of the market.

Cotton.—We have repeatedly expressed the opinion, and still hold to the view, that the supply outlook for next season is far more important than the temporary discord with present spot facts. With the poor outlook for the new crop, plenty of capital will be found to take care of the remnants of this season. Only a radical change for the better in new crop prospects could alter the situation. The cold, dry weather of the past week must have robbed Texas of a great deal of the benefit of the recent moderate rain, and as indications favor fair and colder weather for the western belt for the coming week, further complaints from drought are to be expected. Generally fair weather is also indicated for the eastern states, but the damage by rain is done there, and in many sections field work will not be possible for another week. The week-end figures were all bullish but the bulls seemed somewhat intimidated by spot news. There will be no complaint if our markets hold back a little and give Liverpool a chance of improving the parity. Bulls will reap the benefit in the end. With such new crop prospects and the developments in this direction, there is undoubtedly much demand for forward protection quietly sneaking into the markets, and the day may come when the three future markets will find themselves overpledged to the world for supplies. Such a condition is a great bullish possibility.

A Wedding Present at Rummage Sale

The "rummage sale" for the benefit of the Home for Incurables which was held last week under the management of some of our most prominent social lights, was a grand success both socially and financially. The charity has become a protege of the elite, and the donations to the affair were most liberal. Drawers and closets were ransacked and there was scarcely a family which did not contribute liberally of its left-overs, undesirables and unnecessaries. One hundred and twenty pictures were amongst the "loot" which sold with lightning rapidity, and, indeed, the purchasers kept so well up with the contributors that at the end of the first afternoon the stocks were depleted so that there was nothing to exhibit for the next day. Some amusing and some embarrassing situations arose, as is, of course, all but inevitable, and Miss Laura McKinstry, who was really the moving spirit of the mart, tells a particularly good story at her own expense. Among the articles consigned for disposal was a vase, costly enough, but so ugly and ungainly that it became quite a joke among the ladies behind the scenes, who were confident that so hideous an "ornament" would never find a purchaser. Miss McKinstry approached a very prominent matron of society with the offending bit of bric-a-brac in her hand, and innocently unaware of what a catastrophe she was provoking, said: "Just look at this, will you? Somebody sent it to be sold, but I don't believe any one could be persuaded to buy it, it is so impossibly hideous." To her surprise, the dowager suddenly congealed, and her eyes took on a stony glare. "You think so?" was her frozen response. "Well, tastes sometimes differ—that was my wedding present to Mrs. So and So."

Such Shocking Intrusion

There is a story going the rounds of the smart set which is as amusing as it is true. It seems that a certain household in one of the trans-bay communities has social aspirations much beyond its financial ability. Members had contracted obligations with a fashionable dressmaker which she had about despaired of ever seeing liquidated. Time and again she had made efforts to collect her bill, only to be met by the charming youngest daughter of the family with the excuse that "Mama is counting the silver and cannot be disturbed. You will have to call when Mama is disengaged." One day recently a swagger card party was assembled at the residence under discussion, when the telephone bell rang and was answered by the maid, who, in reply to her question, "Who is it?" received the startling answer: "The Sheriff. Is Mrs. Blank in? Please ask her to step to the 'phone." There was no evading the summons and she was compelled to present herself. "Madame," was the next message which was transmitted, "I have here a dressmaker's account for a considerable bill and I wish to know if you intend to settle and when." The words were straight to the point and the tones anything but a gentle whisper, but it is said the embarrassment was all on the part of the guests, for Madame sweetly calmed the incensed officer of the law with an assurance that she would see her obligation liquidated on the next day.

The Record for Engagement Cups

Alyce Sullivan, the much feted bride to be, has been the recipient of a larger number of beautiful engagement gifts than any other girl on record in this locality. She proudly boasts that she intends, all her life, to wash her own tea cups after the manner of the housewives of old, lest they be made to suffer through careless handling. As she already has a hundred and seven she has undertaken a large contract to adhere to. Her souvenirs are not all in the shape of porcelain, for she has received just as many other costly mementoes, the relatives having been lavish in their bestowal of jewelry, some of it too beautiful, almost, to wear. Very soon, now, the wedding gifts will begin to accumulate, for the invitations will be out in the course of a week or two. The original date, the twenty-third of June, has been changed to the thirtieth, chiefly to accommodate the bride's cousin, Miss Alice Dunn of Boston, who is to be one of the bridal party, as the earlier day was too soon for her brother who is to accompany her, to make the necessary connections. Miss Dunn is affectionately remembered from her last visit and will be cordially welcomed by the friends she made on that occasion. The entire details of the wedding have not yet been completed, but the ceremony will take place at St. Brigid's church, the parish church of both the bride and the groom, and there will be at least six attendants. After the honeymoon, they will reside permanently in San Francisco, where they contemplate building their own house.

An Oriental Beauty in Society

Apropos the rumor that the wife of the Japanese Consul-General has a taste for smart set functions, a correspondent writes that if San Francisco society were less parochial in its notions the lady would probably be welcomed by our fashionable herd. She informs me that Madame Takahira, wife of the Japanese Ambassador, is one of the most popular hostesses in the diplomatic set in Washington. "Presiding over one of the most beautifully appointed homes in the city," writes my correspondent, "the Baroness Takahira has an ambitious place in the life of the community. A tiny little personage, distinctly Oriental in type and unusually pretty. She has very effectually 'made good' as an embassy chatelaine. Her gowns are marvels of elegance and modishness; also her hats and her jewels. At state function she wears a glittering tira of diamonds and a diamond necklace and bodice jewels of great value and beauty and robes which show the utmost skill of the Parisian craftswomen. To the smallest incidentals the embassy appointment is Occidental, the service perfect, the livery and carriages spick and span and essentially good form, as are also the dinners, luncheons, teas and receptions which the Baroness Takahira gives for the social glorification of far off Nippon. The only daughter of the house, dainty little Miss Kiyo, goes about in the gorgeously colored and embroidered robes of a young girl of Japan. Next season Miss Kiyo is coming out."

The MacMonnies-Jones Engagement

Last week I suggested the possibility of error with respect to the identity of Miss Alice Jones whose engagment to Frederick MacMonnies, the sculptor, was recently announced in Paris. I am now informed that she is the daughter of ex-Senator Jones of Nevada, who is now living in Santa Monica. She made the acquaintance of MacMonnies in Washington when he was engaged on a statue for one of the parks of the capital. Later she went to Paris to study sculpture under the guidance of MacMonnies. She is the eldest daughter of Senator Jones. Marion, the second daughter, married a Mr. Farquharson, an architect, and lives in Santa Monica with her parents. Georgiana, the third daughter, who is unmarried, lives in New York.

The Ready Letter Writer

Since the return of a very charming young lady from abroad the dear five hundred are all wondering at the cessation of attention from the only son of a well known capitalist, who was conspicuously devoted to her before her departure. Apropos of this there is a good story. It seems that this same young man was the devoted admirer of another young lady, an only daughter, who reciprocated his affection. She, also, went abroad, and while in Paris the two girls met. What more natural than that the two exiled Californiennes should talk of home and compare notes and news of their friends? In the course of one of their conversations each of the girls became aware of the state of the other's feelings, and that both were corresponding with the young man in question. Further confidences led them to a comparison of the letters received, and one may judge of their astonishment when they discovered the epistles to be, word for word and letter for letter, exact counterparts, each professing the same deep love and undying interest. Needless to expatiate on the result, but when the young man meets either of the girls now there is a decided lowering of the temperature. This same young man is getting something of a reputation for his appreciation for charming girls. He is just as assiduous now in his attentions to another heiress who recently went abroad with her

An Unexpected Marriage

Society has had another matrimonial shock second only to that experienced when the elopement of Emily Wilson and Orville Pratt was made public. This time it is Katherine Martin and Marcel Cerf who have disturbed the smiling surface of affairs. The marriage took place on Thursday, May 6th, just previous to the departure of the Mongolia. The ceremony was performed at Dr. Worcester's (Swedenborgian) church at twelve o'clock; and as the steamer departed for Honolulu precisely at one, the bridal couple were well out on the high seas before any one knew of it. Miss Martin is the daughter of Mrs. John Dahlgren, and a half-sister of Mrs. Francis Grace, who was Theodosia Cook. Her mother was Miss Carrie Colton, youngest daughter of General and Mrs. David D. Colton, and it goes without saying, a member of the most exclusive social herd. Mrs. Dahlgren's first husband was the late Daniel Cook, and after his death she married Henry McLean Martin, the father of last week's last bride. He died some years ago while on a visit to Montana, and in the course of time the widow accepted Mr. John Dahlgren, an attorney many years her junior. As a young girl Carrie Colton was considered the most beautiful and attractive of the social belles of her day. She met her present husband while he was engaged in some of the litigation growing out of the manipulation of the Colton bonds in connection with the affairs of the defunct California Safe Deposit. It is said to be a most congenial union. Mr. Dahlgren was very proud of his handsome, spirituelle stepdaughter, but those who are intimate enough to know say that she dislikes exceedingly her position of dependence on him. She has been teaching French in Miss Head's school, and recently has been taking a special course at the University. She is a tall, willowy, graceful girl, refined and accomplished, but she cared little for society. Mr. Marcel Cerf, the bridegroom, is an attorney who first came into prominence in connection with Bartnett and the California Safe Deposit Company. His brother, Myrtle Cerf, was associated with Abraham Ruef. The Cerfs are extremely orthodox French Jews and society is dividing its wonderment between the unexpected marriage itself and speculations as to how the bride will reconcile herself to her husband's family, or they to her. Her mother and sister are said to be as much surprised as the rest of the world. It is a curious coincidence that two marriages should have come about through the same bank disaster, for it was while serving as clerk to Bartnett that Mr. Cerf, through Mr. Dahlgren, had his introduction to Miss Martin.

Social Status of the Chauffeur

Society is undecided as to the precise status of the chauffeur. The type of man who accepts service in private employ hereabouts seems to make it inadvisable to relegate him to the menial caste, as was the matter of course with coachmen, and yet there seems to be something out of place in the present tendency to make him a member of the family. The question was being discussed the other day on a California street car by the little heroine of a recent elopement and an eastern friend. "I think it is positively disgusting, the deferential manner which you San Francisco girls assume when you are addressing your chauffeurs," criticized the haughty miss from beyond the Rockies. "But," protested the other, "they really are so superior, you know. Why, our chauffeur is nicer than any society man I ever met, and I'm sure he knows a lot more. He certainly wouldn't like it if we didn't say 'Mr. ———' when we spoke to him."

Gossip From Del Monte

Del Monte and its vicinity are very lively just now. The military element is very much in evidence, and there is nothing like the brass buttons for brightening up any place or occasion. General Marion P. Maus returned last week to the Monterey Presidio. During his absence in the East the Post was in command of Col. R. L. Bullard of the Eighth Infantry. After the sailing of the Twentieth for the Philippines, on the fifth of June, the Eighth Infantry will be stationed at Monterey under the command of Col. Charles Mason. One battalion is already located there under Major Wright. Both Mrs. Mason and Mrs. Bullard were heartily welcomed at the Presidio, where they have become very popular. * * Mrs. William R. Smedberg is visiting Major and Mrs. George McIver at the Monterey Presidio. Mrs. McIver is well remembered as the Colonel's daughter, Nellie Smedberg. * * A fascinating little army bride now at Del Monte is Mrs. Richard E. Cummins. Lieutenant

E. Potter, two young Englishmen with large business interest in Shanghai, who are making a tour of the world; Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Hopkins of Santa Barbara and ex-Governor and Mrs. George C. Pardee.

The Parting of the Ways

The veiled hints of a matrimonial rift in the Cunningham household and possibilities of an approaching divorce have been confirmed and the secret is now public property. Mrs. May-Mott-Smith-Bird-Cunningham will be again the complainant in a suit for the annulment of marriage. Mrs. Cunningham is one of the best known designers of artistic jewelry, and has won recognition both at home and abroad. She is the daughter of John Mott Smith who was minister plenipotentiary from Hawaii to the United States before the annexation. Her first marriage took place in Boston in 1898, when she became the wife of John E. Bird. She parted from him through divorce, retaining the guardianship of her little daughter. Her marriage to C. C. Cunningham, who was formerly a military instructor, but lately engaged in real estate business, was by a secret ceremony about three years ago. At the opening of the Sequoia Club last week, which was celebrated by a card party following a dinner, it was noticed that the Cunninghams were preserving a condition of armed neutrality. They avoided speaking to each other at all, but while the husband was devoting himself to his cards at one table, his wife was engaged at another, and when the time for departure arrived Mrs. Cunningham left without the attendance of her spouse. A few days later all the world was let into the secret.

The Mixing of Gold Braid

The otherwise auspicious opening of the Army and Navy Club has been somewhat marred by the dissatisfaction expressed over the mixing of the different patterns of gold braid. The preponderance of National Guardsmen is not agreeable to the two branches of the regular service, and there is a prediction that the club will never be the rendezvous of the Army and Navy while this is the case. The only member of the military service who seems to be satisfied with things as they are is Lieutenant (Happy)) Hazzard, whose good nature is proverbial. While an Army and Navy Club has been a crying need in San Francisco for years, even at this late day it would probably not have come into existence but for the exertions of Mrs. Kathryn Voorhies Henry. Primarily, she was interested in the renting of the Voorhies mansion, which has been a white elephant on the hands of the family since the death of Dr. Voorhies, and secondarily, she has always been interested in the army, and found no great difficulty in persuading the men of the service that they needed a place of their own to play in.

In the Social Spotlight

Rear Admiral Uriel Sebree, who will take command of the Pacific Fleet on retirement of Rear Admiral Swinburn, is at the Fairmont while his ship is in port. Admiral Sebree is accompanied by Mrs. Sebree and their son, J. H. Sebree, who is also in the navy. Mrs. Sebree is always lavishly entertained by her friends when she is in the city.

Mr. and Mrs. G. B. Castle, accompanied by the Misses Dorothy and Margaret Castle, have arrived at the Fairmont. The Castles are from Honolulu, where Mr. Castle is one of the most prominent business men in the islands.

Amongst recent additions to the Fairmont Service Set are: James G. Field, U. S. N.; Holden A. Evans, Constructor, U. S. N.; F. D. Burns, U. S. N.; F. K. Perkins, U. S. N.; R. H. Leigh, U. S. N.; Commander Lucien Young, U. S. N.; Commander Godfrey Webster, U. S. N.

Miss Brooke Rose, niece of Mrs. Selden S. Wright, who left the city for Honolulu just before the fire, and extended her journey to Yokohama, is now on her way back and will arrive here early in June.

Mrs. Lewis Risdon Meade was recently the hostess of a delightful house party at Byron Springs. Her guests were Miss Alice Poorman, Miss Ruth Sadler, Miss O'Brien, and three officers of the West Virginia.

Miss Marion Curtis was hostess at a luncheon and musicale on Wednesday, May 12th, at her home in San Rafael.

Miss Alice Poorman of Alameda recently made Mrs. Howard Taylor Blethen the guest of honor at her home where some clever amateur theatricals afforded much entertainment. Mrs. Blethen is a recent bride who was formerly Miss. Maisey Crowley.

San Francisco arrivals at the Hotel del Coronado last week were: John D. Spreckels, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. L. J. Holton and chauffeur, George A. Lamb, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin T. Dow, Will E. Keller, and Lieutenant and Mrs. M. K. Metcalf, Mare Island.

The class of '83 Alumni, University of California, are giving a banquet this evening in the banquet hall of the Hotel Victoria. Among the new prominent guests of the Victoria are numbered Mr. J. N. Sims and Mr. S. W. Hauptman. Other arrivals at the hotel are A. S. Darrow, H. R. Garlick, and Mrs. McDonald from Redwoods. Misses Maud and Cecilia O'Connell have also taken permanent appartments at the hotel.

Mrs. William C. Van Fleet and her son, Allen, left last week for Paris, where Mrs. Van Fleet will be joined by her sisters, Mrs. Green and Mrs. McCrum, who have already been abroad for some time. Upon the return of Allen Van Fleet he will

Pain's Carnival at Idora

With the finest fireworks display yet given the New York production of Pain's Carnival at Naples and Eruption of Vesuvius will terminate its engagement at Idora Park tonight. It is the rule with the Pain managers to fire all set pieces and rockets remaining in the magazine at the close of each of its engagements and it is because of this policy that this evening's display will be unusually generous and beautiful. Particularly fine will be the special pyrotechnic exhibits which will include set pieces picturing Pain's wonderful forest of fire, Niagara Falls, Aladdin's tree, an electric fountain with twelve transformations, a giant sun-wheel, Jacko, the fireworks monkey, and a score of other magnificent conceptions.

For the crowds that will come to Idora tomorrow, Patrick Conway and his band have prepared a program which promises to surpass all former treats. It will be the longest program yet given and embrace many selections heard for the first time on the coast in band arrangement.

In the dizzy heights of their aerial rigging the Bickett family will perform feats of daring which, it is said, will surpass those of last week. The Bicketts have veritably solved the problem of aerial navigation and their trapeze gymnastics are the delight of thousands of spectators afternoon and evening.

The Idora clowns are now making their headquarters on the Children's Playgrounds where they roll in the sand, swing in the swings and even paddle in the cool wading pools much to the delight of the little ones.

Every one of Idora's numerous concessions will be in full swing. The immense skating rink has been entirely resurfaced since last Sunday and will prove the delight of hundreds of devotees of the "rollers." The rink band which now plays evey day has prepared a special program of Sunday music.

take up the study of law, in which his father, Judge Van Fleet, and his father's cousin, Chief Justice Beatty, have made such enviable reputations.

Mrs. Hippolite Dutard, who has been abroad for several years, arrived in New York last week on her way back to California. Her return was hastened by the illness of her nephew, young Sheldon.

Mrs. William Leymone Wills, wife of Dr. Wills of Los Angeles, who has been visiting her aunt, Mrs. J. de Darth Shorb, in this city for a week, has returned to her southern home.

Mrs. William Irwin and Miss Helene have deferred their eastern trip until after the Newhall-McBean wedding. They expect to depart this week for a lengthy visit and later will go abroad.

Mrs. Walter S. Newhall, who was pretty Nellie Trowbridge, is enjoying a visit in Honolulu. She left San Francisco some months ago in company with Mrs. W. S. Porter and Mrs. and Mrs. McGowan. They will return early in June.

A most enjoyable musicale took place at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Edwin S. Newhall recently. About fifty guests were entertained, all members of a musical club to which the Misses Frances and Virginia Newhall belong and which has met once a week during the winter.

An enthusiastic meeting of the Ladies' Kennel Association of California was held in the Hotel St. Francis last week, when several ladies of social prominence signified their intention of joining the organization which already includes in its membership most of the aristocratic owners of fine dogs on the Pacific Coast. It is the intention of the association to bring out a showing of animals equal to the best of New York or any of the eastern states, and the show at Burlingame on September 9th, and the subsequent exhibition of the Association at Idora Park on the week following will be signalled as among the most notable exhibitions ever given in the West. Entries of all the best pedigreed dogs on the Coast have been assured all these months in advance of the shows.

Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Zellerbach have gone abroad on a six months' trip.

Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Coryell have come up to the city from their home in Menlo Park and are at ther apartments at the Fairmont. Mr. and Mrs. J. Parker Currier, who recently moved to San Rafael, have been in the city for a short visit, and have occupied their rooms at the Fairmont during their stay.

Mrs. George Hellman, who has been very ill at the Cottage Hospital in San Rafael, is now on the road to recovery and is recuperating at the Hotel Rafael.

Mrs. Spaulding, formerly Georgie Lacy, now of Southern California, is visiting her cousin, Mrs. W. A. Bryant, on Washington street.

On Friday, May 14th, the ladies of San Rafael will give a bridge party at the Hotel Rafael for the benefit of the San Rafael Improvement Club. Prominent ladies from all around the bay have promised to attend.

One of the prettiest "bridge-teas" at the St. Francis last week was that of Mrs. John T. Meyers in honor of Mrs. Thomas Huntington. A suggestion of spring was noted in both the decorations and the gowns, and the prizes were miniatures of famous French beauties in tapestry frames. Among the players were Mrs. Wellington Gregg, W. P. Harmon, Joseph Masten, George Hill Stoddard, Marshall Hale, Charles Crocker, Noble Eaton, Frank Somers, Harry Umbsen, Prentiss C. Hale, Frank Kerrigan, George Fish, and the Misses Enid Gregg, Elsye Schultz and Georgia Hammon.

An engagement shortly to be announced between the daughter of a prominent railroad magnate and the son of a man also conspicuous in railroad circles is going to surprise intimate friends and society in general when it is made public.

Arrivals at the Summer Resorts

Mrs. H. A. Butters and her daughters, Miss Marie and Miss Marguerite, have just returned from Paraiso Springs in their motor, and report the roads in excellent condition.

The roads from Gilroy to the Hot Springs have been put in excellent condition for automobiles, and the run from San Jose to the Springs can be made in two hours. Amongst the parties that spent the last week end at Gilroy Hot Springs were: Mr. and Mrs. Otto tum Suden of San Francisco; Mrs. H. E. Barstow, Mr. and Mrs. Center, Miss Rosselet Henderson, Miss Laura Sargent, F. E. Barstow, Miss K. Shipley and Joseph J. Bliss, Alameda; Jess Jenness and Harry Mendoza, Oakland

At the Highlands, Ross, are stopping Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Bee, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Grosse, Mr. and Mrs. L. Nordman, Mr. and Mrs. John P. Young, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Heneman, Mrs. Fred S. Johnson, Miss Helen Johnson, Mrs. Holcombe, Mr. and Mrs. Henry R. Sander, Dr. and Mrs. Hopper and family.

Pacific Grove Hotel seems to be a favorite summer resort. Amongst the long list of summer visitors there are to be noted from San Francisco and its vicinity the following: George W. Lane, W. Gorham, C. S. Girivan, E. B. Castelen, C. M. Hunter, Harry E. Dore, A. W. Dow, Mrs. H. Cook, A. C. Furlong, W. F.

At the Van Ness

The four act farcical comedy entitled "The Genius" will be played at the Van Ness Theatre by Nat C. Goodwin and Edna Goodrich during the week commencing Monday night. It is just two years since Nat Goodwin's last visit. On that occasion he gave a few performances of this laughter provoking comedy. It proved one of the best hits of his career and his success in the role of Jack Spencer will be well remembered by those who were so fortunate as to attend. He is giving a special revival of the DeMille play for the coming week. Miss Edna Goodrich will once more appear in the role of Nell Graham which was so exquisitely played by her during the former engagement. "The Genius" is crowded with laughs. In its presentation Mr. Goodwin and Miss Goodrich will be ably assisted by Neil O'Brien as the musician, E. W. Morrison as the painter, Arthur Behrens as the sculptor; Carl Anthony, Lowel J. Sherman, Zeffie Tilbury, R. W. Tucker, Alice Butler, Anna Heritage, Pauline Lord, Jean Rawlston. Matinee Saturday. "Jack Straw," the comedy in which John Drew is to make his appearance at the Van Ness Theatre on Monday, May 24th, is especially interesting to woman not only because it is full of amusing situations and clever, witty lines, but also because it affords an opportunity for the ladies of the cast to wear some particularly stunning gowns. Among the women in the cast are Rose Coghlan, Mary Boland, Adelaide Prince, Grace Henderson. The John Drew engagement is already attracting widespread attention. Seats go on sale Thursday.

The Burton Holmes Travelogues at the Garrick

Nothing could be more interesting and instructive than the Burton Holmes Travelogues which Mr. Wright Kramer is delivering in the Garrick Theatre and which will end this week, closing Manager Greenbaum's unusually busy season of music, drama and lectures. These travel talks have proved to be exceptionally entertaining, drawing larger houses each night and meeting with the highest appreciation. "Fez," the isolated Moroccan city is the subject for this Thursday and Friday nights and Saturday afternoon. Few Americans have ever seen this metropolis. Mr. Holmes will take you on a pictorial journey so wonderfully realistic that you almost imagine yourself in the beautiful Moorish palaces and on the pathless, beflowered plains which he traversed in his travels through that almost unknown country of Morocco. There has been great demand for more of the Travelogues, and so it is that Manager Greenbaum has finally arranged for three additional ones on this Saturday evening, May 15th, when "Paris" will be given, on this Sunday afternoon, when "London" will be the topic, and on Sunday evening, when "Berlin" will be visited.

At The Alcazar

"Dorothy Vernon of Haddon Hall," dramatized from the widely read novel of the same title, will be given a sumptuous presentation at the Alcazar during the present week. The stage version follows as nearly as possible the text of the story. The action takes place in England during the reign of Queen Elizabeth, who is one of the characters introduced, but she is not the only royalty, for her ill-fated relative, Mary, Queen of Scots, is likewise there. Dorothy is a self-willed miss who sets herself in opposition to her father, Sir George, who is determined that she shall marry her cousin, Sir Malcolm. She is just as determined not to do so, but, moreover, to marry Sir John Manners for love, without consideration of politics or "duty," and she is as unmoved by the injunctions of her father as she is by the commands of the Queen. In those good old times parental and sovereign authority were not mere words, and Dorothy is made to feel the force of physical violence, all to no purpose. During the period of stress she is subjected to imprisonment and half-starved, fights a duel, rescues her lover from execution, saves Queen Mary from capture and accomplishes other feats which only a heroine of romance or a desperately beleaguered maiden of her day and generation would think of attempting. The tenseness of the political situation is lightened by bits of comedy and courtship, and the play ought to be as well received as the story was when it was new. Adele Belgarde and Louise Brownell will essay respectively the parts of the two queens, Elizabeth of England and Mary of Scotland. Evelyn Vaughn will be Dorothy, the heroine; Bertram Lytell will impersonate Sir John Manners; Will R. Walling will appear as Sir Malcolm Vernon; A. Burt Westerner as Sir George, the father of Dorothy; Howard Hickman as the Earl of Rutland; John B. Maher as the dwarf jester; Ernest Glendenning as Sir William St. Loe; Christie McLean as Lady Vernon; Bessie Barriscale as Jennie Faxon; Effie Bond as Bess the cook.

CHARLES DOW CLARK

The versatile comedian of the Valencia Theatre, as Myron Cooper, in "York State Folks" next week.

Western Drama at the Liberty

The Bishop Players at the Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, give "The Prisoner of Zenda" for the last time at the matinee and evening performances this Saturday and Sunday, and on Monday next the scene changes from the fanciful domain of Europe to the Rocky Mountains, when the play will be "Tennessee's Pardner." For a great many years this drama has been a favorite one with theatregoers all over the country. Its story is a strong one of life in the early Nevada mining camps peopled with accurately drawn Western characters and unfolding a dainty little romance. There are many stirring scenes introduced, and, through the character of Geewhiliker Hay, some of the most genuinely amusing comedy the stage has known. The characters are all excellent acting roles, making "Tennessee's Pardner" an especially desirable play for a stock company. Miss Helen Holmes as Tennessee Kent, and Landers Stevens as Caleb Swan, the gambler, have the leading roles, and in their support will be found all the Liberty favorites. "The Road to Yesterday," which has not yet been seen in Oakland, is in preparation to follow.

"Piff Paff Pouff"

The musical absurdity "Piff Paff Pouff" will go on record as one of the greatest success the Princess has had. Great kudos should be awarded to principals, stage and musical directors, orchestra, chorus and all concerned in this bright and enjoyable performance. Fred Mace in a variety of costumes is the life and soul of the performance, and his song, "The Ghost That Never Walked," which he sings in a sort of Billikens makeup is itself worth more than the price of admission. May Boley ably aids him in his efforts to amuse and Helen Darling, Zoe Barnett, James Stevens, Budd Ross, Edwin Emery, Walter Catlett and a host of pretty girl choristers do their share in contributing to a picturesque and diverting entertainment in which there is not a yawn or dull moment. To miss "Piff Paff Pouff" is to miss the best entertainment of its kind that has been given in this city in many a moon. It will run only another week.

Vaudeville at the Orpheum

Some clever artists are coming to the Orpheum next week. Among them are the Lulu Beeson trio, consisting of Lulu Beeson, Ward and Weber. They present a picturesque singing and dancing act called "A Night in El Paso," in which the two young men attired in Mexican costume make their appearance in a canoe and serenade in front of an adobe hut and are answered by Miss Beeson from the window. Agile dancing succeeds and for a finale the trio engage in a particularly animated hard shoe dance. The Countess Rossi and M. Paulo will present a fascinating act entitled "During the Performance." The appearance of the beautiful young Countess will recall a remarkably sensational incident and one which nearly caused an international complication. She was one of the most popular singers at the leading operatic theatres in St. Petersburg and Moscow, when she met the wealthy aristocrat who gave her his title but not his heart. Shortly after their marriage his Tartaric brutality asserted itself and his acts of cruelty culminated in confining his wife in an asylum from which she escaped through the connivance of a faithful servant and made her escape to Paris where she regained the custody of her child. There she met Monsieur Paulo who engaged her for an American tour and in this country she has lived since, repeatedly harassed by her husband who has made unsuccessful attempts to gain the possession of their child. Flo Adler, whose catchy and popular songs have made her an immense favorite in the vaudeville treatres of this country will be included in the attractions of the coming bill. Quite a while has elapsed since Miss Adler last appeared in this city, but she is pleasantly remembered and is sure of a most cordial reception. Knight Brothers and Marion Sawtelle, whose clever character impersonations and eccentric dancing recently scored a great hit, will return for next week only which will be the last of the Five Juggling Normans, Frederick Allen and Co., Francini-Olloms and the inimitable Russell Brothers, assisted by Flora Bonfanti Russell in their laughable farce "Our Servant Girls." New Orpheum Motion Pictures will conclude one of the best entertainments in the history of vaudeville.

COUNTESS OLGA ROSSI
Who will appear at the Orpheum next week.

At the Valencia

The last performances of the exciting English melodrama, "Sporting Life," in which the redoubtable Battling Nelson is knocked out by Paul McAllister, will take place at the Valencia Theatre this Sunday afternoon and evening. On Monday night a decided change will be made, when "York State Folks," a pastoral comedy drama in four acts, will be seen for the first time in this city. There is humor galore in "York State Folks." Written by Arthur Sidman, a character comedian, for his own text, it abounds in quaint studies of a group of simple minded country people. Chief among these is Myron Cooper, the village organist who is Tax Collector as well. At the opening of the play the little town in which the scenes are laid is much excited over the proposed laying of a railroad line into its quiet neighborhood. Simon Peter Martin, the village wagon maker, is a vigorous opponent of the measure, as he sees that his business might become affected thereby. Myron, however, is more public spirited and advocates the granting of the franchise rights, and is joined in his support by Frank Martin, son of the wagon maker. A quarrel ensues between the oldtime friends, and the elder Martin vents his spleen on the others by absolutely refusing to allow his son to marry the girl of his choice if he stands by the railroad. This happens at an unfortunate time for Frank, who has been gambling and lost a hundred and fifty dollars. Myron comes to his rescue and lends him money, using for the purpose some of the public funds in his possession. A further and deeper trouble occurs when Martin, as the head of the village corporation, demands an accounting from the Tax Collector. To tell where the money has been applied would be to disclose the truth about Frank, and Myron remains silent, taking on himself the accusation that he has misapplied public moneys. How this tangle is straightened out forms the balance of the play, which moves through a series of situations, both pathetic and amusing. For the principal role Charles Dow Clark has been chosen. He is one of the best exponents of rural types on the American stage. George Osbourne will be the Simon Peter Martin and Paul McAllister will play the unfortunate son.

In the Limelight

The final performance of "The Easterner" by Nat C. Goodwin and Edna Goodrich, will be given at the Van Ness Theatre on Sunday night.

The versatile members of the Valencia Stock Company covered themselves with such glory in their recent rendition of Hoyt's "A Texas Steer," that the management has decided to give them another chance in a similar laughmaker, "The Man From Mexico," which will be staged in hilarious style after "York State Folks."

Three of Charles Frohman's leading stars, John Drew, Ethel Barrymore and Marie Doro, will follow each other at the Van Ness Theatre. Then comes "The Merry Widow."

Arthur Sidman, author of "York State Folks," which will be produced next week at the Valencia, was the originator of the immortal conundrum—"Why is a mouse that spins?" to which the answer is, "Because the higher the fewer."

Nat C. Goodwin has a most abiding faith in California for he has just added to his large holdings here, a $100,000 orange grove at Fullerton. It is said to be one of the most magnificent groves of its size in the country.

Arthur Cunningham, than whom there was never a more popular baritone nor Irish actor in San Francisco, has been secured by Manager Walter Hoff Seely for the Valencia Theatre forces and will open an extended engagement in a favorite Irish play Monday evening, May 31st. W. T. Sheehan, Joseph Murphy's former stage manager, who will doubtless be pleasantly remembered for his clever work in "Kerry Gow" and "Shaun Rhue," will return with Mr. Cunningham. The latter will receive a welcome that will raise the roof.

In Russia it is unlawful to kiss in public. A kiss in the street is penalized by a fine approximating $3.75, and on a car by a fine of $5.00 A declaration of love written on a post card renders the sender liable to a fine of $2.50.

A curious custom is still in force in Norwich, by virtue of which, on three days in the year, any one can claim a substantial meal for nothing. The only qualification is that the applicants shall repeat aloud in St. Giles' church a prayer for the sovereign's health. After that they may partake of a meal of meat, broth and bread, finished off by a liberal allowance of beer.

King Edward has many extraordinary privileges and powers which people in general are not aware of and which it is probable that he himself does not realize. He is sole proprietor of the beds of all tidal rivers, and that part of the shore line all round the coast which lies between high and low water belongs to him absolutely. He may put it to any use that he sees fit. Theoretically every inch of ground in the kingdom belongs to him and not to the landlords. The king has the sole right to print the Bible, the Book of Common Prayer and all the acts of Parliament, and if he chose he could forbid the printing of any or all of them anywhere within the British dominions.

In Brittany the elaborate fiction of the unwilling bride and reluctant parents is carried out with as much prearranged ceremony as in China, where the bride, screaming and remonstrating, is carried into her new home. When the Breton bridesmaid goes in the morning to help the bride to prepare for the wedding, she has either hidden herself, or is proceeding about her usual labors with an air of studied indifference, and when finally persuaded to don her wedding garments, her shoes are missing, secreted by her parents to signify their unwillingness to part with her. When the bridegroom with his group of friends, the best man and the speech maker, come to fetch the bride, they find the doors closed and barred and no attention paid to their knocks. An elaborate parley ensues, in which it is represented that some mistake has been made, and the young lady is not willing to be married. Then various substitutes are offered, beginning with grannie, and ending with the youngest child, each being refused. Finally, eloquence is supposed to prevail, the doors are opened, and a search for the reluctant lady ends with a pretence of capture, after which all join in the wedding procession and proceed to the church.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY SALE OF REAL ESTATE SHOULD NOT BE MADE

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California—Dept. 10, No. 7168.

In the Matter of the Estate of CHARLOTTE F. CLARKE, Deceased.

Upon reading and filing the petition of Charles G. Lyman, executor of the last will and testament of CHARLOTTE F. CLARKE, deceased,

It is ordered that all persons interested in the estate of Charlotte F. Clarke, deceased, appear in said Court on Thursday, the 17th day of June, 1909, at the hour of 10 o'clock A. M. of said day, and the courtroom of said Court, Department No. 10 thereof, in the Grant Building on the Southeast corner of Market and Seventh streets in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, then and there to show cause, if any they have, why the said Charles G. Lyman as such executor, should not sell the following described real estate, situate, lying and being in the Township of Brooklyn, County of Alameda, State of California, bounded and described as follows:

Beginning at the most southern corner of that certain piece or parcel of land containing 32.56 acres heretofore conveyed by Chas. W. Leach to Elizabeth Leach by deed dated January 16th, 1894, and recorded in Liber 527 of Deeds, page 360, Alameda County Records, said point being on the northern line of County Road No. 724; thence along the southwestern boundary line of said 32.56 acre tract North 51 degrees west 10.93 chains; thence North 25 degrees 35 minutes East 4.25 chains; thence North 49 degrees 50 minutes East 1.72 chains; thence North 72 degrees 40 minutes East 3.29 chains; thence South 69 degrees 15 minutes East 5.17 chains; thence North 52 degrees 15 minutes East 2.91 chains; thence North 79 degrees 30 minutes East 1.50 chains; thence South 60 degrees East 2.00 chains; thence South 79 degrees 45 minutes East 4.93 chains to the Northern boundary line of the said 32.56 acre tract; thence along said boundary line South 61 degrees East 4.74 chains to the aforesaid Northern line of County Road No. 724 and thence along said road line South 63 degrees 55 minutes West 13.22 chains South 59 degrees 45 minutes West 6.05 chains to the place of beginning. Containing 18.47 acres and being a portion of the aforesaid 32.56 acre tract.

Excepting the parcel described as follows: Commencing at the intersection of the Southwestern boundary of the land conveyed by Wickham Havens et ux to Arthur H. Breed by deed dated September 12th, 1906, and recorded October 10th, 1906, in Liber 1239 of Deeds, page 73, Alameda County Records, with the Northern line of 13th Avenue, as widened to 100 feet in width and as shown on that certain map entitled "Map showing land to be taken for widening of Thirteenth Avenue or Walker Street from the center line of Hampel Street to the Northern property line of Arthur H. Breed," filed October 10th, 1907, in the office of the Recorder of Alameda County; and from said point of commencement running North 51 degrees .01 minutes West along the Southwestern boundary line of said land conveyed by Havens to Breed 695.48 feet; thence North 25 degrees 24 1-2 minutes East along the Northwestern boundary line of said land so conveyed by Haven to Breed 236.5 feet; thence South 32 degrees 14 1-2 minutes East 101.6 feet; thence Southeasterly on the arc of a circle of 1332.69 feet radius concave to the left or Northeast and tangent to the last aforesaid course 524.2 feet; thence South 54 degrees 47 minutes East tangent to said arc 192.7 feet to said Northern line of said 13th Avenue as widened according to said Map; thence South 59 degrees 33 minutes West along said Northern line of said 13th Avenue 151.62 feet to the point of commencement. Containing 2.57 acres of land.

Also excepting a 25 foot strip of land along the Southeastern line of said property taken for the widening of 13th Avenue, as shown upon the Map of said widening hereinbefore referred to.

It is further ordered that the order to show cause be published for at least once a week for four successive weeks in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and also in the "Alameda Daily Argus," a newspaper of general circulation in the County of Alameda, State of California, for at least once a week for four successive weeks.

impossible; and, believe me, by that time there was scholarly mind and much to make up. Achieve the impossible! An audacious thing for an innately modest man to say, even to his cronies, and one which Friend Poverty, looking his sternest, must needs discountenance.

Moreover, it was lese majeste. For just then in California Jack London, nothing loth, had been acclaimed emperor of the mightier-than-sword, and his loyal subjects were given to regard another Californian's breaking into the magazines as if it were through the hedge of his divinity, forgetting, if they ever knew it, that in "the realm of gold" is room for more than one king. Wide enough for Alexander is the domain of the imagination. Of which fact Jack London was well aware, and bore himself accordingly, but not his subjects.

In God's and his good time, however, Herman Whitaker began to break into the magazines, into Harper's, The Century, Everybody's, The American, Ainslee's, Munsey's, The Cosmopolitan, McClure's, etc., and those who, at most, looked for him to pay his confrere Jack London the mead of flattery in its sincerest form, were disappointed in him.

But, save in his own State, he of the face prophetic of The Planter was not without honor. Stern Poverty began to look around for another to befriend, one, if possible, with a like capacity for taking pains. On the strength of his short-stories, the conservative Harper & Bros. staked him for a year the while he mined The Settler, and again for sixteen months, lest his quondam friend call upon him, waste his time, and interrupt the panning-out of The Planter.

Envious as are its eyes, it will surely do the heart of our own little literary world good to hear that, over and above those in The Probationer, Herman Whitaker has had printed in high-class magazines enough short-stories to make three volumes, which Harpers intend to put the seal of their imprint upon in the near future.

While Mexico is waxing hot over the wide circulation of The Planter, assuring its lambs that "the old lion who faced cannon is not to be disturbed by pen-pricks," and inviting the disturber to cross the frontier and be knifed, he is coolly, if peripatetically planning chapters of a new novel, a story of Canada of forty years ago, the serial rights of which are already bespoke.

Not the least of the pleasure in writing of Herman Whitaker is due to the fact that there is no least need of insisting on the duality of artist and man. Made of honest stuff, he is a magnificent friend, and no mean enemy. Masculine to the core, "in the fell clutch of Circumstance," he has worked, not wept aloud. For instance, it befell that they who once had been nine were now eight, so that the artist must needs mother the sevenfold Mouth, answer its multitudinous cries, bake bread for it—twenty loaves to the baking, of flour packed on his own shoulders miles up the Piedmont hills. Widows with Poverty for friend, and broods of seven to provide for, cook for, wash and wash for, clothe and mend for, correct and caress, get into bed and out of bed, pack off to school, and all the never-ending rest of it, will appreciate, if otherwise versed in the gentle art of reading, the mastery of the hand that wrote The Settler what time they who had once been nine were eight.

As to Herman Whitaker the artist as such, let one adjective, and that his own, suffice. He who writes of the "ineffectual knees" of the new-dropt calf did not, I take it, lay his Doctor of Philosophy degree at the feet of the Muse, in vain.

If, therefore, the scientists of Mars are in communication with the earth, as Professor Flammarion says they are, President Wheeler, Dr. Jordan and Dr. Taylor must have long since come under their surprised observation. It is not hard to imagine a vastly learned Martian bacteriologist gazing intently through the lens of a high-power Martian microscope upon the strange movements and the peculiar gestures of Dr. Taylor delivering the star speech at a banquet in honor of a Japanese admiral; or striving to make head or tail of the seemingly intelligent effort of Dr. Jordan in the act of addressing a women's club on the Noble Duty of Motherhood; or classifying data of earthworms from scrutiny of President Wheeler while preaching civic reform to a bunch of Berkeley Good Government Leagueres. I can easily imagine this sore of "communication" between Mars and the earth; but I must confess my utter inability to reverse the process. I cannot imagine Dr. Jordan or Dr. Taylor or President Wheeler "communicating" with Mars. Compared with their fellow earth-men they are superlatively wise; but compared with the most ordinary citizen of Mars they are not deuce high. Science, learning, wisdom have been accumulating in Mars for a million years; our science, learning and wisdom is of yesterday. It would be as difficult for an inhabitant of Mars to "communicate" intelligently with Dr. Taylor or Dr. Jordan or President Wheeler as for any of these pundits to hold intelligent converse with a chimpanzee. The intellectual gap between Charles Darwin or Francis Bacon and an Australian bushman is a crack in a china teacup compared with the interstellar crevasse that separates the puny intellect of the wisest earth-man from that of the meanest and least learned Martian. I doubt if even my favorite scientist, Professor Edgar Lucien Larkin realizes how infinitely inferior he is to the most illiterate of the canal diggers of Mars; and I am sure that Dr. Taylor, Dr. Jordan and President Wheeler have never risen to the intellectual altitude where they were able to give the subject a thought.

The Well-Dressed Man

(Mr. J. M. Jacobi by whom the interesting articles that have appeared on this page was contributed is going abroad, in the European centres of fashion he will gather material for this department.—Editor's note.)

We take pleasure in presenting to our readers the picture of Mr. J. M. Jacobi, the author of the series of interesting articles on "What to Wear, When and Where," which have been appearing exclusively in our columns. Mr. Jacobi is about to depart for a business and pleasure trip abroad, in the course of which he will visit London, Paris, Vienna and Berlin for the purpose of selecting the newest styles and materials, and his great taste and thorough knowledge of everything pertaining to the well dressed man are assurance that what he vouches for on his return will be beyond question both the latest and the best. Mr. Jacobi was thoroughly educated to his business. His knowledge was acquired by painstaking effort such as is usually associated with scientific and literary achievement. He mastered the profession of cutter and designer in the principal academy of Dresden, and from there he went to one of the largest clothiers of Frankfort-on-the-Main as their designer. In 1886 he accepted a position as designer with the largest clothing house of Rochester, and after coming to California he associated himself with his brother in a merchant tailoring business on Montgomery street, near California, where he remained until the fire. He was one of the first to locate on Fillmore street after the disaster, and likewise, one of the pioneers of the downtown hegira. With H. M. Bloch, for twenty-two years with Roos Brothers, he opened an establishment at the corner of Sutter and Montgomery streets, which is one of the best, if not the best equipped in the city in all the details of men's clothing. Mr. Jacobi has promised to continue his correspondence with Town Talk during his absence, and we are anticipating some very interesting articles on styles and fashions from the centers where styles are fashioned and fashion dictates style. After the business is disposed of, Mr. Jacobi will give himself a brief period of relaxation and visit his old home in Fribingen, which he left over twenty-two years ago. We wish him a pleasant and profitable journey and a safe return.

J. M. JACOBI

Author of "What to Wear, When and Where."

The picture below is a reproduction of a painting by Rembrandt, and represents the six master tailors of Amsterdam, sitting as arbiters of what to wear, when and where, as it was then the custom. These six master tailors decided upon the fabrics, prices and fashions for the season. Some consider trusts a recent invention, but in the day of Rembrandt these master tailors ruled with an iron hand. As one can see by their attire, styles of the present day have materially changed as has also the mode of making style, which is now a matter of individuality. Every important manufacturer who is independent of outside forces makes and creates his own styles, and it is not uncommon for the designers to earn $15,000 to $25,000 per year.

Auto Notes

[illegible] has just completed a business trip to Detroit and back again, but not in a Packard. But he says he prefers it to a Pullman.

P. C. Thede of Madera has just broken a long standing record with his Thomas Flyer. From Madera to Sugar Pine, a distance of sixty miles, over mountain roads he drove in three hours and twenty minutes. The former record of 3 hours and 55 minutes has stood for some time. In a letter to E. P. Brinegar, President of the Pioneer Automobile Company telling of his feat, Mr. Thede said: "While I knew it was a hill climber, and had speed, the way it performed on this occasion was a revelation to me. I cannot say too much for it, and I would like to see someone beat this time, which I am sure I can shave another 28 minutes without letting the machine out to its capacity."

In the military run held in connection with the recent New York Automobile Carnival, the machine gun of the Ninth Regiment was mounted in the tonneau of a four-cylinder Oldsmobile. The run was made during a heavy storm of sleet and rain. The Oldsmobile carried the full gun crew besides the field gun itself. The gun was fired without any apparent injury to the machine from the recoil. The rapidity with which the evolutions which accompany gun drill were made, astonished the soldiers, who were accustomed to using horses for the purpose.

Three Japanese officers of the Aso, who were so well entertained by friends that they forgot the passing hours, hurried into the salesroom of the Pioneer Automobile Company, and declaring that they only had fifteen minutes in which to make their ship, asked for the fastest car in the place. They were accommodated with a Thomas Flyer and by a burst of speed not within the limits of the law, the machine landed the officers at the dock with time to spare.

"Wild Bill" Ruess, who recently broke the record from Los Angeles to Santa Barbara and incidentally beat the railroad time twenty-five minutes, gives half the credit of his success to Diamond Tires and Marsh Rims which equipped his car. Not one particle of tire trouble was had and the tires are good for many more such trips.

It will be of interest to the automobile purchasing public to learn that late advices from Mr. C. S. Howard of the Howard Automobile Company who has been at the Buick factory in Flint, Michigan, for the past two weeks endeavoring to secure a large increase in the allotment for this season of Buick automobiles for his territory, the State of California, are to the effect that he has secured the desired results and believes he will be able to supply the entire demand.

Three new machines were sent up under their own power to Yreka and a jolly party consisting mainly of officers of the Siskiyou Light and Power Company, together with a few friends made up the crew. The cars were a Chalmers-Detroit Forty, Oldsmobile and Chalmers-Detroit Thirty, and will be used by the company for various purposes. The party consisted of J. W. Churchill, J. O. Churchill, Alex Rosborough, J. B. Sperry, T. E. Osborne, Henry Wadsworth and S. Williams.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY MORTGAGE SHOULD NOT BE RENEWED

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California—No. 7168. Dept. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of CHARLOTTE F. CLARKE, Deceased.

Upon reading and filing the petition of Charles G. Lyman, executor of the Last Will and Testament of CHARLOTTE F. CLARKE, deceased,

It is ordered that all persons interested in said estate be and appear before this court in the courtroom thereof, in the Grant Building, on the southeast corner of Market and Seventh Streets, San Francisco, California, on Wednesday, the 16th day of June, 1909, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m. of said day, then and there to show cause, if any they have, why the said Charles G. Lyman as such executor should not make, execute and deliver to James Otis, trustee under the will of A. C. Whitcomb, deceased, a promissory note in writing for the sum of $45,000, with interest thereon at the rate of seven and one-half per cent per annum gross, and make, execute and deliver to the said James Otis, trustee under the will of A. C. Whitcomb, deceased, a mortgage as security for said promissory note, of the following described real estate:

Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the southerly line of O'Farrell Street with the easterly line of Mason Street, running thence southerly and along said easterly line of Mason Street eighty-seven (87) feet six (6) inches; thence at right angles easterly fifty-five (55) feet; thence at right angles northerly eighty-seven (87) feet six (6) inches, and thence at right angles westerly and along said southerly line of O'Farrell Street fifty-five (55) feet to the easterly line of Mason Street and the point of commencement, being a part of fifty vara block No. 197.

Reference is hereby made to the petition on file herein for further particulars.

It is further ordered that this notice be published once a week for four successive weeks in Town Talk, a newspaper of general circulation in said City and County.

"The Other Side of the Door"

Though death has severed the literary partnership of the Chamberlain sisters, Esther and Lucia, it is generally understood that the story, "The Other Side of the Door," was begun in collaboration before the fatal illness of Miss Esther. It is a lighter and less elaborate plot than that of "The Coast of Chance," but not, for that reason, to be taken lightly. The scene is laid entirely in San Francisco and in a period which, hitherto has attracted but little if any attention, that "dull, flat, level stretch," which lay between the early romantic Pioneer days, and the later time of colossal fortunes made on the stock market and in railroad exploitation, the period just at the close of the civil war, when sectional feeling, even in remote California, was of sufficient strength to determine social attitudes; when professional gambling was almost a respectable occupation and when the edges of the old and new overlapped each other so that extremes touched if they did not precisely meet. In fact, Miss Chamberlain has opened the door upon a time and a development which is as well worthy of exploitation as any other in the history of this community, which, not yet sixty years of age, is young enough to remember, and old enough to condone its own youthful follies. The action is compressed into a space of a few weeks and the scene confined to the few blocks lying between Mason and Washington streets and the old city hall, and the plot, in less restrained hands might have been melodramatic. Briefly it concerns the entanglement of a young girl, carefully brought up, in a sensational murder case in which the victim was the keeper of a popular gambling resort, and the apparent criminal, a young man about town whose wild ways and the loss of his inherited fortune had brought him into social disrepute. Circumstantial evidence was strong against young Montgomery, but Ellie, who, as it happened, had slipped out of the house to do some early morning shopping, happened to be the only one on Dupont street when the fatal shot was fired, and the only one to see the young man emerge with the smoking pistol in his hand and hers was the final link in the evidence. The plot further involved a beautiful and mysterious woman unknown to society, supposedly Spanish, and certainly rich. Her efforts were put forth to clear Montgomery. She was reputed to have powerful influence in legal circles, and as the sequel proved, her reputation in that respect was not underrated. The adventures which befel Miss Ellie when, under the convoyance of the district attorney, she answered the summons of the mysterious woman and called at the house on the other side of the door, and the other desperate measures resorted to in order to clear the accused without fastening suspicion on the real criminal make an exciting plot, but to San Franciscans the attraction of "The Other Side of the Door" will lie in its resurrection of the old city, gone long before the fire wiped out its last remnants—of the houses set back in their gardens, with the conservatories, the wooden sidewalks, and the old city hall, with its galleries and courtyard, the yellow omnibuses and the horse cars. Of course there is a love story and a sufficiently romantic one to please the most exacting. Though the plot deals with the sordid, under side of things, it is by no means a study of the disagreeable, but, in spite of the apparent improbability, the general effect is that of anything but gloom. HOW TO OBTAIN GOVERNMENT TIMBER OR AGRICULTURAL LANDS

Without Having to Live on the Land a Day

The average individual thinks that the only way to get title to Government Lands is make a homestead entry and live on same five years before getting a title. He is of the opinion he is limited to 160 acres and he would not live on a tract of land five years if the Government would deed him over one-half of a state. There is a way for any citizen of the United States to obtain title to any Government timber or agricultural land in any state in the Union without residence or cultivation. The only way to do this is to buy U. S. Government Land certificates and pay for your land with same. Railroads and timbermen obtain title to Government Land in this way.

The Government discontinued issuing these certificates about the year 1883 therefore they are getting very scarce. The firm of H. B. Sanders and Co., Judge Building, Salt Lake City, Utah, have secured a few thousand acres of them that they are offering at the rate of $25.00 per acre. The certificates come in 80 and 120 acre pieces, and can be located on any timber or agricultural land in Alaska or any state in the Union. Each piece has a letter of approval attached to it from the Government, and there is no limit to the time in which to locate them. According to the official report of the Department of Interior under date of July 1, 1908, there is still over 75 million acres of unappropriated land in Oregon, Washington, California and Idaho. Some of the finest timber land in the world is open for entry in these states. Any person wishing to get title to some timber land or anticipating starting a townsite in the west can get full particulars by writing the above firm.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Dept. No. 10, No. 20,925.

WINIFRED TRUBY, Plaintiff,
vs.
JAMES MICHAEL TRUBY, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to JAMES MICHAEL TRUBY, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's failure to provide plaintiff herein with any of the necessaries of life; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 20th day of January, A. D. 1909.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 2955 New Series, Dept. No. 9 Probate.

In the Matter of the Estate of FREDERIC GARNIER, also called FREDERICK GARNIER, Deceased.

It appearing to this Court by the petition this day presented and filed by Alexandrine Sarraille, the Administratrix of the estate of FREDERIC GARNIER also called FREDERICK GARNIER, deceased, that it is necessary to sell the whole of the real estate of said decedent to pay the debts of said decedent, and that it is for the advantage, benefit and best interests of the estate and those interested therein that a sale of the whole of the real property of the estate of said decedent and of said decedent be made,

Now therefore, it is ordered, that all persons interested in the estate of said decedent appear before this Court on Monday, the 24th day of May, A. D. 1909, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m. of that day, in the Courtroom of Department No. 9 Probate, in the Grant Building, situate at the corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, then and there to show cause why an order should not be granted said Administratrix to sell the whole of the real property of the said decedent and of the estate of said decedent.

And it is further ordered that a copy of this order be published four successive weeks next preceding said day in Town Talk, a newspaper printed and published in said City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Done in open Court this 19th day of April, A. D. 1909.

J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

In the Matter of the Estate of WILLIAM HALLECK DEMING, Deceased.

It appearing to this Court from the petition of Azalene E. Deming, Administratrix of the estate of WILLIAM HALLECK DEMING, deceased, that so much of the personal property of said estate particularly described in said petition as is not by law exempt from execution is of insufficient value, if sold, to pay the allowance of the family of said decedent, the debts of said decedent, and the debts, expenses and charges of administration of said estate; and it further appearing that it is necessary to sell such of said personal property as is not exempt by law from execution, and all of the real property of said decedent situate in the town of Menlo Park, County of San Mateo, State of California, particularly described in said petition, to pay the allowance of the family and the debts of said decedent, and the debts, expenses and charges of administration of said estate, and that it is for the best interests of said estate and those interested therein that a sale of so much of said personal property as is exempt by law from execution, and the whole of the real property hereinabove mentioned; and it further appearing that all persons interested in the said estate have signified in writing their assent that said real and personal property may be sold as prayed for in said petition;

Now, therefore, it is ordered that all persons interested in the estate of said decedent, WILLIAM HALLECK DEMING, appear before this Court on Monday, the 24th day of May, 1909, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m. of that day, in the Courtroom of Department No. 9 Probate of the above entitled Court, in the Grant Building, situate at the corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, then and there to show cause why an order should not be granted to said Administratrix to sell said real and personal property of said decedent.

April 21, 1909 J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 894 N. S. Dept. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of CAROLINE F. PLUNKETT, Deceased.

LUCY M. F. WANZER, executrix of the last will and testament of Caroline F. Plunkett, deceased, having filed herein a petition praying for an order from this Court authorizing, directing and empowering her to renew a note and mortgage in the sum of twenty-four hundred (2400) dollars and for that purpose to borrow said sum and for the purpose of securing the payment of such sum to mortgage to the lender of such money that certain real property of said estate situate in said City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point on the easterly line of San Jose Avenue, distant thereon 149 feet from the northerly line of Twenty-fifth Street, and running thence northerly along the said easterly line of San Jose Avenue thirty-seven (37) feet, thence at right angles easterly ninety (90) feet, thence at right angles southerly thirty seven (37) feet, thence at right angles westerly ninety (90) feet, to the said easterly line of San Jose Avenue and the point of commencement, together with the improvements thereon—said property being a portion of Block 169 Mission Addition.

It is ordered that all persons interested in said estate be and appear before this Court at the courtroom, Department 10, Grant Building, in said City and County, on the 31st day of May, 1909, then and there to show cause why said order should not be made. This notice shall be published in a newspaper of general circulation for two successive weeks.

Native of New York—(1) Yes, Judge Mahan is a native of California. (2) Judge Dooling is also a native. (3) Judge Dunne is also a native.

Ukiah—No, the people of San Francisco are not likely to increase the city's bonded debt for the pleasure of seeing a lot of professional politicians in public office trying to run a street railroad.

Inquirer—Yes, Judge Murasky still has the case under advisement. No, it is not unusual for Judge Murasky to spend so much time in making up his mind.

Pioneer—Yes, San Francisco is full of ex-reformers, but such is the ingratitude of the people that most of our ex-reformers are broke. There is a man in San Francisco on his uppers who spent half his life trying to send bad men to jail. He looks now as though he'd like to be in jail himself, assured as he would be—in jail—of three square meals a day.

A Superfluous "Civic Center"

The citizens of San Francisco will do well to keep a sharp eye upon this "civic center" proposition. Its sponsors are not the best evidence of the necessity for the enormous expenditure proposed. Neither is it quite clear why this city should pay $8,000,000 for a "civic center" when, by the expenditure of less than half that sum, we can create one on the site of the city hall. It is not contended that San Francisco must go without a "civic center," if that is to be the name of the place where the city hall will be erected. But why move the "civic center" from its present site to the corner of Van Ness avenue and Fell street, as has been proposed? Why pay $8,000,000 for a new city hall on a new site? The foundation of the old city hall, now in process of demolition, is presumably in good condition and will sustain any structure that will be erected upon it. We paid about $2,000,000 for that foundation and it hasn't been sold, as yet, for a fraction of the moiety of the original cost, like the other portions of the city hall. And since nobody would buy it, because it is not worth carting away as "salvage," why not save $2,000,000 by building the new city hall on it? There will probably be large graft in the construction in any event, and it would be a larger crime against the taxpayers if that graft were allowed to batten on $8,000,000 instead of being restricted to the lesser graft possible in an expenditure of half that sum. If a new site is purchased it is almost certain that the price will exceed the actual or market value of the property in hundreds of thousands of dollars. Is it good policy to take that money out of the pockets of the taxpayers to put it into the pockets of favored property owners? Is it not the very worst of bad economic policies to squander that money in the purchase of something that we already possess?

Why It Is Superfluous

One argument urged in favor of a new "civic center" is apparently wholly absurd. It is contended that if the "civic center" is located at Van Ness avenue and Fell street it will be made a thing of architectural beauty and a civic joy forever. No doubt the building itself will be an imposing and commodious structure; modern architecture is not so bad if devised and designed by competent architects. But how are we going to prevent the owners of adjacent properties from erecting whatever will serve most profitably for their purposes? The old city hall was the center of a cluster of shacks; and what guarantee have we that the proposed "civic center" will not be a replica of the old one? Whatever profit may accrue from the city hall to the tradesmen, the restaurant-keepers and the saloonmen who will flock to the "civic center," can be acquired in unsightly, ramshackle structures as well as in marble palaces and granite houses designed by expensive architects and built by union labor. It is probable that the proponents of this "civic center" believe that the new city hall will be surrounded by tall office buildings and massive structures of every kind; but as yet these dreamers have not agitated for a law that shall compel the property owners in the vicinity of Van Ness avenue and Fell street to build office buildings and massive structures on their property to match the architecture of the city hall. Another argument is to the effect that if the "civic center" is moved farther along on Market street property values in the western section of the city will be materially enhanced. This is extremely doubtful. Market street itself requires no such adventitious aid; and the demand for property in the vicinity of the new city hall will not respond beyond the limitations of the actual profit from the investment. "Civic centers" do not enhance property values beyond their normal increase. The proposition as it has been presented does not look good. There are more pressing needs than a "civic center," and these should be provided for before we tax ourselves for what we do not need. Let us build our city hall but let us build it on the site of the old city hall.

The Unemployed

An interesting side light was shed on the desperate condition of the British army of unemployed when the authorities of Preston, England, made or found work for a considerable body of mendicants. They went on a strike as soon as they discovered that they were not to have their expected Saturday half-holiday. So far from being surfeited with enforced leisure the one condition which appealed most forcibly to their understanding was more leisure, with money to waste at the "pub" and the usual "blue Monday" which every employer of labor in the British Isles takes as a matter of course, men either not showing up for the job at all or coming in such condition that they are unfit to accomplish anything. A writer in one of the London weeklies not long ago spoke some plain words on this subject of the unemployed, and their processions and riotous demands. While he admitted that there was much distress he said that it set very lightly on the shoulders of many of the unemployed who, while they could drive their wives and children to earning ever so little, were comfortably content to loaf around the public houses, doze in the parks, listen to the inflammatory rhetoric of the anarchistic orators, and join in a procession for the sake of the excitement it provided. Steady employment, which would interfere with these diversions, was the last thing they desired. In any considerable body of men there must be widely varying individualities. A fair proportion of those who are clamoring for public relief in this country are undoubtedly honest workmen who have slipped out of the ranks and have been unable to catch up again with the procession, but the vast majority have no liking for labor, no pride or satisfaction in achievement. They have no ambition, no sense of duty, and no desire to better themselves in any sense other than in the securing of more money to be spent in debasing pleasures. Efforts have been made to remove colonies of the British unemployed to Australia and Canada, where, with a new start and a reasonable degree of industry they could find a footing, but they are unwilling to tear themselves away from the slothful existence which they now endure. Sociologists are fond of attributing this slothfulness to causes for which society at large is held responsible. Chief among these are child labor and insufficient food, but it is to be noted that the class in our own South variously denominated "cracker," "po'whites," and "dirt" or "clay eaters" have approximately the same easy philosophy of "come day, go day and God send Sunday," a class largely descended from the inmates of debtors' prisons and street vagrants whom the proprietors of the royal colonies transported to America to grow up in a new land. Three hundred years has scarcely modified their disposition to any noticeable extent. Neither child labor nor insufficient food was forced upon them as an unavoidable condition, but, as water will find its own level, so they have settled down as "renters" or "croppers," as illicit distillers and trouble makers generally where they develop exertion enough to be anything at all. There is more hope for the wicked than for the weak. The bad may be confined or converted, the bold restrained, the timid encouraged, but for the weak there is no help.

Education Made Him a Criminal

A negro on trial for forgery in one of the western States, who has been already an inmate of several restraining institutions, turns out to be a university graduate. His defence, if such it can be called,—over-education—is said to be unique, yet it is so only in the sense that it has never before been offered as an extenuating circumstance in a criminal case. As a matter of plain, prosaic fact, over-education is one of the social diseases of the day. There was a world of truth in the old-fashioned protest against educating children "beyond their station," for despite the assertion of the Declaration of Independence all men are not created equal in mental, any more than in muscular ability, and there is just as much harm done in encouraging mental weaklings to believe they are endowed with brains as there is in demanding heavy labor from immature and unfit physical frames. There is as little use in giving to youths an opportunity to acquire learning which they cannot make use of as there would be in binding burdens to their backs. Despite the sneers at utilitarianism an education which is not useful is worse than useless. Emerson's advice to buy books in the line of your genius was sound enough, but the difficulty with schoolmen, who arrogate to themselves the exclusive privilege of giving advice, is that they assume their own to be the only genius worth considering. It is their theory that the college-trained workman is the superior of his brother who learns his trade in a shop, and that it is possible to cultivate in all men either a passion for the humanities or a taste for scientific research. One of the pet theories of the Abolitionists was that the educated negro would equal, if not outstrip, his white brother, and after the civil war the educational facilities provided for the freedman were superior to those enjoyed by the white race of the South. For more than forty years the negroes have been taught and they have been encouraged to attend institutions of learning. The second generation since the abolition of slavery is well advanced in years, yet, despite the encouragement and cultivation up to the present time no negro of unmixed blood has written a book or proved in any other way that mental capacity was latent in the race. The negroes labor under no greater disadvantages than the Indians. On the contrary, the Indians have been herded upon reservations, disfranchished and given small encouragement to acquire individual property, still some Indians have distinguished themselves in every branch of art and science. The weak point in our educational propaganda is in the assumption that all are educable and that in proportion to the cultivation bestowed upon the mind, physical occupation is degrading. The negro who now attributes his moral obliquity to over-education may not be far from the truth. He is one more instance of the sort of thing that made Horace Greeley class college graduates with horned cattle and Collis P. Huntington boast that he could hire as many as he wanted of the breed for ten dollars a week. His college education has escaped the reproach of being "utilitarian," but even the most advanced advocates of college training can hardly claim an ethical value for what can be put to account only in the commission of crime.

The Curse of Cattishness

The Bishop of London, addressing a fashionable girls' school, gave the students some good advice, which, like most of that commodity, will go to waste. He told them plainly that society was cursed not so much by what we generally term immorality as by cattishness. Reputations are forfeited far more often as the result of innuendoes, petty spites and small scandals than by acts which would warrant putting the offenders outside the pale. Women know these things quite as well as bishops and law givers. But it is not easy to convince them that it is their duty to act up to the knowledge and refrain from repeating the "good story" or adding embellishments and surmises with every outward assurance of fact. The much lauded faculty of intuition by which a woman is credited with the capacity to leap to a correct conclusion while dull, plodding man must traverse the prosaic highway, encourages all but the most cautious to assume that what appears to her as likely is beyond need of proof. Boys start out in the world with an equipment not vastly different from that of their sisters. They are just as much given to making unsubstantiated statements and seeing everything from their own point of view, but their education begins early. Even if it is neglected in the home, school fellows and playmates have an inconvenient fashion of pounding into them a regard for their conventions, and a comfortable preference for a whole skin becomes of as much practical value as a code of exalted ethics. Girls, on the contrary, are rarely, if ever, taken to account for their words, and as they grow older they escape more and more the consequences of owning a forked tongue. It is said that never in the history of the world were women more discreet in their remarks and comments as during the dueling days of the Old South, for, though a lady was exempt from punishment it was understood that her nearest male relatives might expect to hold themselves in readiness to assume consequences. Cattishness, like ragging, is essentially a vice of the sex, and it can be defended on precisely the same ground and no other—a vague "nervousness," which is a compound of bad temper, envy and jealousy, and a convenient victim. Nine times out of ten, the mean little story is told with a deliberate intention to injure, but like pussy's claws the intent is carefully hidden. It is the woman that most often disclaims intention who is primed with it, and it is her cleverness that enables her to transfer the responsibility for circulating her slanders while she sits back in apparent amazement that there should really be so much in what appeared so little.

The Story of the Bee

From the Persian

Allah, always great and merciful—may his name be forever praised!—had gladdened the earth with a beautiful day. In the bright sunshine the birds flew hither and thither, the multi-colored flowers opened their petals to the light and warmth, and filled the air with the most delicate perfumes. All living things joined in a hymn of praise to the Almighty who had gifted the earth with the sunlight and many other blessings.

A little Bee flew busily from one flower to another, and sinking down upon each, extracted the honey, until it could hold no more.

"God be with you!" suddenly called out a voice.

The Bee stopped his work for a moment and looked around. He saw that it was an Ass who had spoken, and answered politely: "I thank you."

"What are you doing here, perched upon that flower," inquired the Ass.

"I am making honey."

"Honey? What is that?"

"Come here and I will show you. Stick out your tongue and you shall taste some of it."

The Ass opened his mouth, the Bee poised itself lightly upon the out thrust tongue, left there a drop of honey and then flew back to the flower. The Ass drew in his tongue and after a moment showed signs of the greatest delight.

"Tell me, Bee, how do you make that honey?" he inquired.

The Bee looked at the Ass in great astonishment, wondering that he did not know how honey was made. He extended one of his antennae and pointing to the wide landscape, exclaimed: "Look around you, Ass, and you will see millions of flowers and thousands of trees in bloom which lift their branches up to the blue heaven. From heaven comes the God-like sun which fills with life every bud and causes the sap to flow in every stem. Together with beautiful flowers and healing plants there grow poisonous weeds, because the sun sheds its light alike upon the just and the unjust."

"What do I care about all that stuff?" asked the Ass, looking around and stamping his hoof impatiently. "What difference does it make what kind of grass grows in the fields? I eat my belly full every day and I have never been harmed by it. What I wanted to find out was about this honey."

"Thou shalt know that, O Ass," hummed the Bee. "From these flowers which are spread upon the earth like a carpet of many colors, I extract the honey and fill myself with it."

This statement of the Bee seemed to the Ass about the stupidest thing he had ever heard, and he replied in an offended way: "I never could have thought, Bee, that you would reply to my friendly salutation by a falsehood. Do you think that I am such an Ass that I cannot distinguish between the truth and a lie?"

"And wherein did I lie?" asked the amazed insect.

"Of course you lied! What you have told me is pure nonsense. You have doubtless forgotten that every day I eat many pounds of grass and flowers, and I have never made any honey yet."

"But remember, O Ass, that I choose only the most delicate flowers, and I extract only the honey and not a single drop of anything that is bitter."

"That's another lie," answered the Ass angrily. "When I daily eat grass and flowers I certainly get the essence of them. And why in me do they not turn into honey?"

"Because you eat haphazard and without making any choice," answered the Bee, but the Ass broke in angrily:

"You cannot make a fool of me. In return for my good wishes, you mock me. Come with me before the court and you shall be properly punished for your false statements."

The Ass and the Bee went together into court, which was presided over at that time by a shrewd Camel, and they submitted the case to the judge.

"I beg you, O learned Camel, to do justice and punish this Bee," began the Ass. "When I was in the field this morning, I saluted him politely and said to him: 'God be with you, what are you doing?' And he answered and said: 'I am making honey,' and let me taste some of it. It was delicious. I wanted to make some too and begged the Bee to tell me the secret. Instead of doing so, he lied to me and said he extracted it from the flowers. Now you know, O upright judge, that I eat flowers every day, good and bad, some with and some without perfume, but did I ever make any honey? You also eat flowers on the field."

The Camel reflected a long time, vainly attempting to arrive at some decision. Finally he shook his head. "I will not risk condemning an innocent person, and so I must refer you to some judges who are wiser than I am. It is true that I myself eat grass and flowers daily and like you, O Ass, I have never made any honey."

Shaking his head doubtfully the Camel walked away, and the Ass said to the Bee: "Let us go to the Lion."

They found the king of beasts surrounded by numerous other animals. The Ass stated his case again.

Many of the spectators shook their heads; they were willing to admit that the Bee did not feed on worms or dirt, yet they could not believe that he could make honey out of the same flowers they ate themselves. So a tumult arose and all called out that the Bee should be punished. The Bee tried vainly to explain to the Lion the manner in which honey was made, but the king of beasts shook his head.

"I understand," he said, and then he called out to the executioner: "Do your work, cut off the Bee's head!"

In answer to the royal command came the grim Panther, armed with a sword. The Bee sank down at the feet of the Lion and begged him to state why he had given such a judgment. The Lion wrinkled his heavy eyebrows, looked threateningly at the little insect and exclaimed: "You must die! I have understood you very well, but you must allow that neither the Ass nor the Camel nor the other animals here have believed you. It is beyond their understanding that you should be able to extract only the honey from the millions of flowers. You'll never be able to make the Ass understand (and the rest of them are all Asses), so if I should permit you to live they will all be dissatisfied and make a lot of trouble for me. No, it is better that you should die, and that I side with the Asses, so that life may go along in the old way. Then honey, and the method of making it, will be forever forgotten. Executioner, do your duty!"

The Panther swung his glittering sword and the head of the Bee rolled at the feet of the judge.

Casual Impressions from Occasional Observations of the Manner in Which the Calhoun Case is Being Conducted, and Some Pertinent Remarks Regarding the Probable Animus of the Prosecution.

By Democritus

I have been paying some little attention to this so-called "Calhoun case." Don't be alarmed; I am not going to "discuss" the "graft prosecution," nor am I going to offer any opinion as to the merits of the controversy—I fully realize that this community is sick and tired of the whole business and the people are impatiently awaiting the collapse of the "prosecution" so that they may attend to other affairs of more importance. What I wish to set forth in this relation are a few desultory impressions resulting from two or three casual visits to the courtroom where this case is being tried.

In the first place I noticed that while the floor space of the courtroom was crowded, the galleries of the hall were empty, notwithstanding that scores of persons were standing on the sidewalk outside waiting for an opportunity to enter. Policemen were stationed at the door to keep the citizens out of the courtroom after all the seats on the floor were filled. I asked one of the policemen why they did not let the people into the gallery, and he told me that it was considered "dangerous." I asked why it was "dangerous" and the policeman said the prosecution was afraid "somebody in the gallery would throw bombs at Heney." I asked why bombs could not be thrown at Heney from the audience on the floor of the hall, and the policeman said they could, but that it would be easier to throw them from the gallery because Jack McCarthy had no eyes in the top of his head. That was a curious answer to my question; I was puzzled and asked for an explanation. "Who is Jack McCarthy," I inquired, "and what has he to do with this barring out of the citizens of San Francisco from a public courtroom where there are seats for a thousand more than are permitted to sit there?" "Jack McCarthy," was the reply, "is Heney's bodyguard. He is paid $5 a day by the taxpayers of San Francisco to sit facing the audience in the courtroom watching for 'suspicious movements' and such persons as he may think intend to inflict great bodily harm on the assistant district attorney. If we were to let people into the gallery Jack McCarthy's eyes would have to be in the top of his head as well as in the upper part of his face."

I was informed also that a man named Otts, said to have been a prizefighter in his better days, was employed as a bodyguard to protect Heney from assault, and that Professor Bunnell of the State University, who taught Greek to Ruef and Heney, was in constant attendance on his person while in Court. Nobody seemed to know whether Professor Bunnell would be useful to Heney in the event of an attempt to blow up the prosecutor with bombs; but all agreed that he was a very brave man to sit so close to the firing line.

I observed that a man named Burns, who, I was told, had formerly been a tailor by occupation, but is now one of the greatest detectives in the world, sat behind Heney during the examination of witnesses. I asked about this person and was informed that he was the most important factor in these graft prosecutions—that without the assistance of Burns there could have been no prosecution; that when Mr. Rudolph Spreckels and Mr. James D. Phelan resolved to give this city a great "moral uplift" they hired Burns to trap three Supervisors by bribing them to vote for the granting of a skating-rink license or something of that sort. After these Supervisors had been "trapped" by the usual keyhole method, in which, by the way, it is said that the moral uplifter, Mr. Rudolph Spreckels participated, they were "sweated" by Burns in the usual manner of the police and detective bureaus, and forced to betray their accomplices in other briberies. After that it was easy, and Mr. Rudolph Spreckels himself was able to "detect" the other Supervisors by frightening a Supervisor named "Big Jim" Gallagher into betraying the entire bunch, who, in their turn, were induced to "confess" on promise of immunity from prosecution for their crimes.

In this way, I am told, the "graft prosecution" laid the foundation of its case. Burns, I was informed, is the right leg of the prosecution; Rudolph Spreckels, my informant said, was the other leg. Deprive the prosecution of Burns, and Heney, who is the brains and the prosecution would have only one leg to stand on.

I happened to be in the courtroom one day when the lawyers for the defense were questioning Mr. James D. Phelan as to his knowledge of the real motives that prompted Claus Spreckels to build the San Joaquin Valley Railroad and to organize the Independent Gas and Electric Light Company. Mr. Phelan didn't seem to know much about the real motives of Claus Spreckels in promoting these schemes, but it appeared from his testimony that Spreckels didn't build the San Joaquin Valley Railroad wholly with his own money. He sold stock in the enterprise to anybody that would buy, including such opulent widows and orphans as he could reach, retaining a controlling interest in the road for himself; and when the time was ripe he sold out the whole concern to the railroad corporation against which the San Joaquin Valley road had been organized as a competitor, thus depriving the poor Rube farmers of the valley of a chance to ship their wheat and other freight at a lower rate than was charged by the existing railroads. Mr. Phelan didn't say so directly in his testimony, but I inferred from what he was compelled to say under cross examination, that many of the poor Rube farmers of the San Joaquin Valley were gulled into buying stock in the Spreckels railroad on the false pretense that it was to be forever a competing road with those already in operation, and that the Rubes would be able to ship their wheat and onions to tidewater for almost nothing per ton instead of paying all the traffic would bear. The most that Witness Phelan would admit upon his own opinion under the most rigid cross examination, was to the effect that Claus Spreckels, in his lifetime, was the greatest philanthropist that had ever happened to the farmers of the San Joaquin Valley.

It was the same eulogy of Spreckels in relation to his Independent Gas and Electric Light scheme—Witness Phelan could not be induced to testify that Spreckels had organized his scheme because the smoke of the existing gas house annoyed him by smudging the western exposure of his tall building at the corner of Market and Third streets and he would not admit that Spreckels profited by finally turning the business over to the gas monopoly for a price far in excess of that which he had expended out of his own pocket; nor did Witness Phelan tell the lawyers that even to this day the gas house smoke continues to smudge the western exposure of the Spreckels building at the corner of Market and Third streets.

Marriage

Thou art my own, my darling and my wife;
And when we pass into another Life,
Still thou art mine. All this which now we see
Is but the childhood of Eternity;
And thou and I, through trials and through tears,
The joys and sorrows of our earthly years,
Are growing up into a single soul,
God's workmanship; a clear completed whole
Made out of twain. Our love is but begun:
For ever and for ever, we are one.

The "Fille-de-Joie"

From shadow to shadow—with white arms I cling
As they come and they go;
Myself but the echo of songs that they sing,
Myself but the shadow of what they would know.
They creep from the shade to the dusk where I lie
Soft-couched on the souls, that have passed to my lips,
Unsought and unloved, unreal as the sigh
That through the barred way of somniloquence slips.

They come and they go like phantoms that glide
From tomb unto tomb; themselves the unrest
Creating the realms that in mock light lie wide.
A smile from my lips, a white flash from my breast,
Then, night and despair, and a face pale and drawn;
Three cries, on the wind, that to low moanings grow,
His, mine and a woman's, apart, in the dawn—
And I cling with white arms as they come and they go.

To sodden, white ashes they come as the fire,
As the edge of the sword to the blunt of the foil;
No flash of the cobra-tongued flame of desire
E'er wakes the inappetent, heavy, dull coil.
They have heard of a star and they search in the mold,
They search, and will search, but they never will find,
And limbs shall grow weak, and hearts shall grow old
As they grope in the light with the step of the blind.

From shadow to shadow—with white arms I cling
When the revel is done,
And the echo that sounds to the song that I sing
Is the crash of a bullet that heralds the sun.
They come and they go, but they never go free,
I beckon in every bright smile of bright eyes;
Let the rag of a soul pay its tribute to me
And I follow till hope and till memory dies.

Fables for the Multitude

Inspired by Recent Untoward Occurrences Which Have Excited the Risibles of the Irreverent Groundlings Much to the Uneasiness of Certain Censorious Moralists Who Have Striven With Great Zeal to Make Their Fellow Citizens Better Than Themselves.

1. The Chief of the Clan Mephitis Mephitica (Mephitis nasticus rex) strolling aimlessly cross-country with the breeze on his back, saw approaching him a fremontolder (Foetor putrescens intolerabilis) and graciously addressed him:

"Welcome, cousin! Though it is our first meeting, your fame has carried far. Glory is added to our royal family that it has so distinguished a Cadet."

"Cadet—nothing," haughtily responded the fremontolder, well knowing that nothing less than a jimmifeelin (Homunculus vipereus opulentus) could inhale his full fragrance and live. "I never was at no military school; besides I don't like your nasty patronizing ways, nohow. And since you are talking of royalty—you might as well know that I am King of our Bunch."

A look of shocked disdain swept over the Monarch's face and he raised his hand to smite; but Foetor, stepping nimbly, interposed himself between Mephitis and the breeze. The blow was arrested in midair. Disdain gave place to wondering adoration.

"O King live forever! The latchet of your shoes I am unworthy"—Mephitis could proceed no further; but still with the look upon his face as of one who sees his God, sank to Earth and yielded up his life.

2. The fremontolder (Foetor putrescens intolerabilis) and the jimmifeelin (Homuncululs vipereus opulentus) were in secret consultation:

"Something," said Foetor, "must be done for the uplift of our city, or we both go on the bum."

"I'll pay for it on the usual condition, of course, that you keep my name out of it." "What do you suggest?" graciously responded Homunculus.

"I'll scatter bits of my shredded character throughout the town. The consequent contagion will make a jim dandy uplift and we will beat the race track gathering shekels."

As said, so done. The atmosphere of the city soon became unbearable. Many deaths resulted. Dr. Blue, hastily summoned, unhesitatingly pronounced the disease a new one, compared to which the bubonic plague was a heavenly boon. With some difficulty he traced it to its origin and classified it as Malum Deo damnati fremontolderi. After the discovery, the extirpation of the cause promptly followed, and Dr. Blue's assurance is given that it is impossible that the human race can be twice so afflicted.

Morals—The fremontolder and the jimmifeelin haven't any.

A Too Portly Portola

I have no wish to deprive Ed Greenway of a single ray of the glory that haloes his classic brow; but there are aureolas too bright for mortal eyes and these may be dimmed without prejudice to the wearer of the nimbus and with beneficial umbrage for those who are compelled to gaze upon its splendor. All that is worth having in the way of social recognition has been given to Ed Greenway; royal honors have been bestowed on him, and he has been named the Czar of San Francisco's Four Hundred—the most elegant of arbiters of the superior elect. Additional honor would, therefore, be superfluous—a sort of heaping Greenway on Greenway; as the piling of Pelion on Ossa, so to speak. Why, then, is it deemed essential that Greenway shall not only be the whole Portola show but also Portola himself? Greenway can well afford to resign the part of old Gaspar since he is the real substance of the fiesta. This Portola will be but an imitation at the best; and the thin disguise will only serve to make the incongruity of the masquerade more apparent. Let us have our Greenway in his proper person; and let us have our Portola in the person of one fitted for the part in form and pressure. Furthermore, Captain Portola was not a corpulent person, and it would not be historically accurate to so represent him. A fat Portola was never seen on land or sea. Besides, Greenway is much better designed, anatomically and architecturally, for classic Greek portrayal—the flowing robe and the voluminous tunic are more to the Greenway mode. When we ordain a Hellenic festival, a Dionysian mystery or a play by Sophocles or Aristophanes, Greenway may cast himself for the leading part without objection from anyone, for there will be no other fitted for the role. But this Portola is quite another thing; and we would as soon think of asking Mayor Taylor to be our Portola without unbearding himself, as to demand that Greenway shall play the ancient Spaniard without training down to the old soldier's weight and form.

One Better Fitted for the Role

Perhaps I am somewhat prejudiced in this matter by the fact that I have a candidate for Portola myself. I have in mind an ideal Portola; a citizen in every way fitted for the part—in face, figure, voice, presence, bearing, and knowledge of the historical requirements of the character. My candidate would be Captain Gaspar de Portola to the life; he would know precisely how Portola would act in the circumstances of this fiesta; he would carry himself with the same dignity; he would speak the same lines that Portola would speak if he could revisit the glimpses of the moon he saw when he came so near to being the discoverer of San Francisco Bay and missed it by the distance that intervenes between Palo Alto and Mussel Rock; he would be so like the original that Sergeant Ortega himself would salute him before he discovered his mistake. I am surprised that nobody except myself has thought of Edward H. Hamilton as Captain Gaspar de Portola in our October revels. And now that I have named him I am sure that Ed Greenway will not hesitate to pass the Captain's helmet and leather jerkin to Ed Hamilton, generously acknowledging that none could more fittingly wear them.

District Attorney Devlin

At this writing the reappointment of District Attorney "Bob" Devlin has not been confirmed by the Senate, but it is about as certain as anything that we can be certain of that Mr. Devlin will continue to perform the duties of the office which he has ornamented for some years and in which he has won no little distinction. The Senate will find no flaw in Mr. Devlin's record. The only thing in his record out of which could be fashioned the simulacrum of a flaw was the circumstance that he prosecuted a man against whom a case had been "worked up" by Detective Burns. This is something that should give us pause for wholesome reflection indicating as it does a decided revolution of sentiment in high places. It was but a short time ago that the indictment of a man was considered in the nature of prima facie evidence of turpitude and government detectives and government prosecutors were expected to "go the limit" in making out cases against accused persons. Since the country was left to its fate by the Great Scourge the Department of Justice has been kept busy sweeping out indictments that were presented in furtherance of sinister political designs, and there have been some remarkable revelations with reference to the peculiar activities of the handy detective who was formerly the hero and the idol of our vociferous muckrakers. At the Mercy of the Sun

The Abbe Moreux has aroused the interest of scientists in his theory with reference to the evolution of the earth. He blames most of our troubles on the sun which has caused the earth to take on sides and peaks. The sides are the great ocean basins. The peaks are in Canada, the Baltic and Siberia. There are lateral forces he says which heave up ridges and fracture the earth's crust, and it is along the lines of fracture that we find the lines of volcanic action. Earthquake shocks, he says, are very frequent. Big and small they number about 30,000 per annum and they seem to occur in increased force as if a kind of periodicity marked their development. They are more numerous in winter than in spring, and more frequently happen by night than by day. He asserts that earthquakes are caused by atmospheric electricity which is due to the sun. The atmosphere, he holds, corresponds to the investment of a Leyden jar. The crust is the jar itself, and the internal charge is represented by the subjacent "magma" or mass which, he says, is formed by liquid iron and gases in greater part. Influenced as a great electrical storehouse by seasonal variations depending on the sun, the earth is at the mercy of the great orb of day in respect of its earthquake shocks. Along the European line of earthquake and volcanic action, the Abbe predicts there shall be future devastation of terrible kind. It is France he fears for most.

THE EARTH'S NEW SHAPE

According to the Abbe Moreux we are no longer living on a sphere. The earth under the influence of the sun has contracted and taken on a shape of pyramidal form with four faces and three summits or peaks.

A Sad and Sordid Story

Among the flotsam of the daily news I find the story of Mrs. Anna C. Turton, once lady-in-waiting to Queen Emma of Hawaii, reduced to abject poverty by litigation with her husband's partner, compelled to pawn her jewels, pictures and furniture to anyone who would loan money on them at usurious interest, and finally dying a charity patient in St. Luke's hospital in this city. Nothing of all this would have been known, probably, if after the death of the woman an attempt had not been made to "administer upon her estate" by persons claiming that she was indebted to them for "board." These claimants have made application to Mrs. John F. Merrill to whose charity Mrs. Turton was beholden for what comfort she enjoyed in her last hours. It appears that Mrs. Turton owned a koawood table, a French mirror and two copies of Murrillo's "Fruit Vendors." These she pawned to D. E. Perry, a loan broker, for $100, and the mortgage was afterwards taken up by Miss Worn, a florist and decorator whose business is chiefly with the rich people of this city. To Miss Worn Mrs. Turton paid $17 a month out of her earnings as a "piece-worker" in a shirt factory. Mrs. Merrill heard of this and informed Miss Worn that the poor woman was in a most pitiful condition, that she was sick, in rags and working for 30 cents a day. Miss Worn is reported to have answered that her dealings with Mrs. Turton was "a business proposition." Then Mrs. Merrill paid the mortgage and recovered the property. It is upon these relics of Mrs. Turton's former wealth that the "creditors" desire to "administer." Although it is one of the saddest stories that I have read in the daily newspapers for many a day, and the greed, the sordid selfishness of those who preyed on this unfortunate woman stirs me to wrath. There is but one bright spot in the miserable story. The goodness of heart that prompted the charity of Mrs. John F. Merrill is the one redeeming feature of this pitiful recital. For such women there must be a glorious reward; as for the others there ought to be adequate recompense in kind.

Where Are These Jewels?

I read the account of Mrs. Turton's misfortunes in all the newspapers and it was the same record in all of them except the Bulletin which omitted the mention that Mrs. Turton pawned her jewels and more valuable property to Claus Spreckels. The Bulletin mentioned all the others—D. E. Perry, the loan broker, Miss Worn, the fashionable decorator, and the women who are now striving to lay hold of what the dead woman left; but the name of Claus Spreckels does not appear. The Bulletin reporter writes of "the sordidness of the affair" and calls it "a pitiful life story" and by implication condemns the persons who profited by the necessities and the misery of this poor woman. But for some reason the Bulletin eliminated Claus Spreckels from the list of those who were pawn brokers for Mrs. Turton and took her property away from her when she was unable longer to pay such interest as pawn brokers charge on chattel mortgages. Usually the Bulletin is not at all squeamish about publishing this sort of news. Why was it so tender of the postmortem fame of Claus Spreckels, and so lavish of its innuendo concerning the others who took the property of Mrs. Turton in pawn for an insignificant proportion of its actual value? Let me guess: Perhaps it is not true that Claus Spreckels was the pawn broker for Mrs. Turton's diamonds; and perhaps the Bulletin, upon investigation found that it was not true. Perhaps Claus Spreckels loaned the full value of the jewels, charged no interest, and allowed Mrs. Turton to redeem her diamonds. Perhaps Claus Spreckels loaned Mrs. Turton the full value of her jewels and when he found that she could not redeem them gave them back to her, telling her that his conscience would not permit him to deprive the widow of her little fortune. Perhaps the Bulletin on investigation learned that Claus Spreckels was not really Mrs. Turton's pawn broker but was her fairy godfather. But if the Bulletin found out that Claus Spreckels was not as black as he had been painted by the reporters of the morning newspapers, why didn't the Bulletin publish the generous action of Claus Spreckels? Let me guess again: Perhaps the Bulletin knows, as we all know, that Claus Spreckels in his lifetime insisted that his light should be hidden under a bushel, and presumed that Claus Spreckels dead would prefer to have the evil that he did live after him and the good interred with his bones, as it was even with Caesar.

A Capitalist and His Emerald

A ripple of mirth has stirred the sacred inner circle of Piedmont, and all because of a leak in the household confidences of the Frank C. Havens's. The story is whispered from one to another, to the unabated glee of those familiar with the fads and foibles of the capitalist, harmless though they be. This time it is all about a beautiful emerald of prodigious proportions and corresponding value which he has had set in a ring. The chiefest Realty Syndicator of them all, so the story goes, feels the joy of possession tinged with the woe of apprehension and the jewel scarcely affords sufficient delight in his waking moments to compensate for the dread of the dark hours. In daylight it is only necessary to cast a glance at his finger to assure himself of the actuality of its safety, but when his watchful eye is closed in slumber there come dreams to haunt him. There were fearsome apprehensions of prowling burglars intent on despoiling him, and dread lest the gleam of a dark lantern directed across the peaceful couch should reveal the sparkling glint of the gem, and ring, stone and all be wrested from the rightful owner. Safes and strong boxes were discredited, and the problem resolved itself into how to retain the bauble constantly in personal possession and yet enjoy a peaceful night's repose. The dilemma was met in an unique and original way by the application of a familiar nursery rhyme to the grave situation and modifying it to meet the special case. The beautiful lady of "Banbury Cross" was decked out with "rings on her fingers and bells on her toes," but the Piedmont capitalist dispenses with the bells and sleeps undisturbed with his emerald safely disposed on his third left toe.

Insurance Circles Agitated

Curiosity was aroused in insurance circles last week when an evening paper published a sensational article under shrieking headlines with reference to a raise in the rates of marine insurance. According to this article the insurance companies having been "appalled by numerous losses," had raised rates from seven to eight per cent. It was said that some of the smaller foreign insurance companies had gone into insolvency and that it was probable "that should the wrecks continue many more of the foreign companies will be forced to suspend operations." It was as to the inspiration of this article that curiosity was aroused in insurance circles. Why, it was asked, should it be said that foreign insurance companies were in danger of suspending operations? Was this assertion intended as a knock in the interest of some local concern? It has been suggested that in view of the sad experience forced upon us by the memorable disaster of 1906 we should not be too proud of our local insurance companies. Though the Firemen's Fund Company was rehabilitated there are cynical critics who say that it may be questioned whether the financiers of that corporation should be proud of their record. I am of the opinion that the rehabilitation of the company, considering its awful plight, was a fine, not to say masterly, achievement, but there is much jealousy in insurance companies, and one hears much scoffing whenever the Firemen's Fund financiers are under discussion. This scoffing is said to be due to the fact that there has been too much unwarranted exultation, too much of the cock-of-the-walk attitude among men who were but recently very glad to accept sympathy and courtesy. During the recent session of the Legislature when Assemblyman Gus Hartman promised to take "a crack at insurance legislation" some cowardly individual issued an anonymous circular designed to enlighten our statesmen on the subject of the methods of the Firemen's Fund Company. It was pointed out that there had been a good deal of frenzied financiering by the Firemen's Fund Company, and it was said that in trying to gobble up all the business in sight through collateral companies many desperate chances had been taken. It was evident that the author of the circular had made an exhaustive study of Firemen's Fund methods, but to say the least he was very uncharitable in his deductions and in his sentiments. But to return to the raise in marine insurance rates: the raise affects nothing but steam schooners which have come to be regarded as a hazardous risk. That the Firemen's Fund Company has raised its rate is of no significance. I believe that the British and Foreign and the Thames and Mersey have done likewise, and these are the companies that really control the situation. As compared with them the F. F. is as a drop in the bucket to the whole volume of liquid.

Some Anecdotes of Meredith

With the death of George Meredith there has passed almost the last of the older generation of novelists, the only notable figure remaining being Thomas Hardy, who, like Meredith, declared some years ago that he had nothing more to write. George Meredith has been prominent in the literary world for more than half a century, and despite his labored and involved style he achieved a large measure of popularity, though possibly, like Browning and Henry James, a good portion of his readers were spurred on by the vanity of regarding themselves as amongst the elect because of their appreciation of what was caviare to ordinary minds. Perhaps the most widely discussed and debated of his novels is "Diana of the Crossways," on account of the incident of Diana Warwick's selling a cabinet secret to a newspaper on the plea that she needed the money in order to maintain her social position, which has led to endless controversies over the character of the heroine and the necessities of the case. It was long believed that the incident itself was historical, that Caroline Elizabeth Sarah Sheridan, the wife of Hon. George Chapple Norton, and later of Sir William Sterling-Maxwell had communicated the secret of Peel's conversion to free trade in 1845 to John Thaddeus Delane, editor of the London Times. As a matter of fact Mrs. Norton had no connection with the betrayal, the news having been communicated by Lord Aberdeen, but notwithstanding Meredith's special denial, and the note to that effect incorporated in later editions, the majority of readers still persist in believing that the fiction is fact. A few years ago Meredith stirred up Christendom by his tentative advocacy of a system of temporary marriage terminating automatically at the end of ten years. Comment and criticism swung between extremes. By some it was argued that term marriages would lead to the destruction of home and fireside; by others the proposed scheme was hailed as a panacea. Meredith was a close associate of the Rossettis, Swinburne and their coterie, and it was once arranged that this quartette should live together as one household. Meredith himself told of an incident which, as far as he was concerned, caused the abandonment of the home. "It was past noon. Rossetti had not yet arisen, though it was an exquisite day. On the breakfast table on a huge dish rested five thick slabs of bacon upon which five rigid eggs had slowly bled to death. Presently Rossetti appeared in his dressing gown, with slippers down at heel, and devoured the dainty repast like an ogre." That was Dante Gabriel, whose name would suggest rose leaves and nightingale's tongues. The one first meal was too much for Meredith, who forfeited his quarter's rent rather than witness a repetition of it. Like most writers, Meredith bitterly resented any interference with his work. At a dinner of literary men an editor who had once employed his pen related an anecdote. A review had proved not long enough for the space it was to occupy and the editor in question took the liberty of adding a few hundred words, with the result that he received an angry letter concerning it. A year later the incident was apparently forgotten, and the same editor was lunching with the novelist and others, amongst them a civil engineer who described a bridge he had just completed in Scotland. When he had finished his description Meredith said: "It is a good thing your bridge is not in America, for if it were I rather thing our friend, the editor, would add an arch or two to it." But Meredith is one of the few British authors who have not conceived it to be their mission to complain unceasingly of this country. Only recently in the course of an interview he confessed that America read his books when England did not, and he said that even in the old days before the international copyright law went into effect American publishers paid him royalties of their own motion though they were under no compulsion to do so. Like most elderly folk, and Meredith had passed his eightieth birthday, he had his whims and crochets, one of them being an adherence to the old fashioned quill pen.

The Author of "St. Elmo"

Though the death of Augusta Evans Wilson has passed almost unchronicled there are few of the older generation of readers who have not wept their eyes red over "St. Elmo" and "Beulah." Augusta Evans was the last of the old guard of whom E. P. Roe, Mrs. E. D. E. N. Southworth, Mary Jane Holmes and May Agnes Fleming were the captains. Though their period of literary activity antedated the lightning methods of production, and processes were both more expensive and more deliberate than today, the number of their readers amazes one even in these days of boomed books and best sellers. To those not familiar with statistics it may come as a surprise to learn that Augusta Evans was not a prolific writer, the number of books to her credit being only nine. Her first, "Inez," a crudely written tale of the defence of the Alamo, which appeared in 1856, was written in her teens, and her last, "Devota," was published in 1907. Her average was one novel in five years, though in fact often a much longer period elapsed. "Macaria" was published in 1864, and was followed two years later by "St. Elmo," and again in three years there appeared what is usually considered her strongest novel, "Vashti," but instead of crowding on the heels of this success, a period of six years went by before "Infelice" and twelve years intervened between that and "At the Mercy of Tiberius." Fifteen years later came "A Speckled Bird," and again an interval of five years when in 1905 there was published her final volume, "Devota." There was method in this leisurely and limited production, for readers not only did not forget their favorite, but were eagerly awaiting each of her romances as soon as it was announced and her publishers were move to pay large advance royalties in order to secure her manuscripts. It is said that C. W. Carlton gave his check for twenty-five thousand dollars before he had the manuscript of "Vashti" in his hand, and it paid him well to treat her liberally. In 1907, long after the vogue for Augusta Evans had died out her income from royalties amounted to the comfortable sum of four thousand dollars. Modern taste has little use for the ponderous verbiage and profuse historical and allegorical allusion of her style. To read one of her novels with a complete understanding of all the references would be a liberal education in itself, but in an earlier age, when there was time for all things and we were less satisfied with impressionistic effects they struck a responsive chord.

She—Here we've been married just one month, and now you no longer love me.

He—But, my dear—

She—Don't try to explain. I'm not blind. You made a mistake—you ought to have married some silly, stupid woman.

He—But, dearest, I've done my best.

Older's Fine Frenzy

Mr. Fremont Older, taking himself with becoming seriousness, has given the ungrateful people of this bored community fair and timely warning. With prophetic eye Mr. Older has discerned an omen boding mischief. With ear a-cock he has caught the mournful cadence of the oar that sweeps the sullen stream of Cocytus; in fancy he has drifted reluctantly upon the turgid bosom of Acheron. Whether he feels that like Asclepius the son of Apollo his manly bosom is to be pierced with a thunderbolt, or like some stray piece of human flotsam along the Barbary Coast, he is to be bludgeoned with his besetting weapon, the silver flask of Bacchus, he does not deign to say. Mr. Older is not in the mood for condescension to such particularities. Suffice it that the community have warning that if this chaste and sinless journalist be saved from assassination it will be a case of cheating Destiny. For Mr. Older in the dolorous doldrums I have the profoundest pity. He is much given to morbid musings, is Mr. Older, and when things aren't going his way the feeling of depression that overwhelms him is accompanied by the most sombre and fantastic visions. But it is not hard to suggestionize this sensitive plant of journalism out of his gloom; to retrieve him from the mental anguish induced by dour self-contemplation. He is responsive to words of cheer. He reacts speedily under the soothing influence of adulation. His powers of recuperation are wonderful. Ere this, I am quite sure, his friends have assured him that he is out of danger. They have told him that it is not to be his fate to die like a hero with his boots on; that as a matter of fact nobody is thirsting for his blood. At the same time, of course, they have commended his attitude of indifference to the dark designs of his enemies; applauded him for simulating a disposition to sacrifice himself for the dear people.

His Hysterical Effusion

In the first transport of agony that Mr. Older experienced on learning of the verdict in the Luther Brown case he broke through all restraint and rushed into print with the usual sad results. His worst enemy could hardly have urged him to do anything more indiscreet. As usual Mr. Older's pen ran riot. But between the lines one could read the mournful soliloquy: O horror! woe on woe! and still they come—more evils in the train that heaven has sent, too deep for words, too heavy to bear. The subtleties of logic that Mr. Older essayed were transparent despite the almost unintelligible phraseology. Schlessinger told the jury that Brown would have been justified in killing Older; the jury acquitted Brown; therefore the verdict of the jury was that Older "is any man's game who cares to pot him." A perfect Bulletin syllogism, that. From the major and minor propositions, there is no escape. According to Bulletin ratiocination the Older conclusion is inevitable, imperative. The verdict of the jury, Mr. Older also tells us, means that he is outlawed by his fellow citizens. This is certainly an inaccuracy. Mr. Older has endeared himself to his fellow-citizens. They love him almost as much as they love Mr. Crothers, or almost as much as they love his other master, Mr. Phelan. They love him for his manly attributes, for the clean fights that he has waged, for his temperate and just criticisms of men and women.

When Assassination Was Approved

It would be unreasonable for a militant journalist of the Older type to expect the approval of all men—of the just and the unjust. It is but natural that there should be some men that would approve the verdict in the Brown case even though they did not believe that it was justified by the evidence. It is but natural also that there should be some men that approve Attorney Bert Schlessinger's sentiments with reference to what Brown would have been justified in doing to Mr. Older. For there are some men with most reprehensible and retentive memories who have kept fresh in their odious recollection many of the things that have marked the course of the much Boughten Bulletin. They remember that when the District Court of Appeal decided the Ruef case the Bulletin printed the names of the judges and their addresses in connection with an article obviously designed to inflame the public mind and incite a mob to deeds of violence. They condemned the Boughten Bulletin at the time for what they conceived to be a most cruel and cowardly performance. And now when they ponder that performance they wonder at Mr. Older's reversal of form and ask the occasion of the rush to his gentle and kind heart of conscientious scruples against assassination. These same unsentimental ones have been reminiscencing with reference to the Hon. James D. Phelan's hortatory speech in an Alameda church, the most salient rounded period of which was an exhortation to the good Christians there assembled to propagate a sentiment in favor of the assassination of Will Dargie, publisher of the Oakland Tribune. The brave publicist was in a high state of indignation that night, and he had very positive views with reference to the desirability of effacing the Tribune's editor. He considered that the assassination of Mr. Dargie would be pregnant with a moral uplift if effected with dramatic sincerity, and suggested that some attention should be paid to the matter of scenery. In his opinion if the assassination took place on the editor's doorstep the moral significance of it would be much more deeply wrought than if the deed were consummated elsewhere. It was but natural that Mr. Older should give publicity to Mr. Phelan's sentiments. In those days when Mr. Older's hide was free from gooseflesh he had no qualms of conscience such as might cause him to reprobate the sanguinary views of the gentleman who has long been the inspiration and the solace pecuniary of the Boughten journal.

The Reign of Terror

Whoever examines faithfully the records of these times, whoever can conceive the circumstances and atmosphere of our Reign of Terror and look into the minds of the men who planned and executed the enormities that scandalized and shocked this community will be convinced that much of what was done was designed to subvert law and order and instigate the killing of citizens by an infuriated mob. If such was not the design of the Olders and the other perverts who have done the dirty work of the Spreckels-Phelan cabal what was the significance of the campaign of abuse against the weekly papers of this city? Has it not been apparent to everybody that they dreaded discussion? Did they not try to abate it by intimidation? These are some of the questions that have been raised in the minds of men of retentive memory by the spectacle of Fremont Older in a state of theatrical panic; in the minds of men who are convinced that if he is free from bloodguiltiness, if murder is not on his soul, it is not because of the gentleness of his spirit or the liveliness of his sense of the ethics of his profession. He is one of the men that preferred the way of blood and violence, to the way of peace and discussion, and he now serves to exemplify the fact that those who are freest with sentiments of violence when their own hide is not in danger, are the most easily susceptible to panic when the situation is reversed. Everybody has not forgotten the meeting called by the canting hypocrites of the League of Justice at the time of the Haas shooting ostensibly for the purpose of calming the community but obviously with the design of inciting mob violence. The brave Mr. Older rejoiced at that time that panic should have seized the Examiner office and that it was deemed the part of discretion to employ armed men to protect the employees of that paper. Happily the Reign of Terror is over. There is no immediate prospect of a revival of the sentiment that was stimulated by the whining cowards of the Graft Prosecution most conspicuous among whom is Fremont Older who now pronounces himself "an outlaw of society" and who has long been an outcast of journalism.

Judge Mahan Abused

Judge Mahan, the distinguished jurist who came to town at the request of his friend Judge Dunne to try Luther Brown, has been most shabbily treated by the Boughten Bulletin. "The result of the trial of Luther Brown," says that unsavory journal is cumulative evidence of the breaking down of law in California." Also:

"Our jury system, owing chiefly to the character of the men elected to the bench is a conspiracy against justice." I do not know anything about the character of Judge Mahan, but I submit that whatever his character the Bulletin by its comments has shown a disposition to sound the depths of ingratitude. Judge Mahan is less deserving of the Bulletin's censure than any person who participated in the trial. Prior to the trial of Luther Brown I knew nothing that could be conceived to be to Judge Mahan's discredit save that he was the friend of that preposterous individual Judge Dunne and apparently didn't care who knew it. My first definitive impression of him I formed when he ordered Brown into custody at the request of the District Attorney, after, it was said, one of Burns's spies came into court and whispered. Judge Mahan explained that it was his habit to grant the requests of the District Attorney. This is a very bad habit and one that should be speedily broken. Some district attorney may some day ask Judge Mahan to send himself to jail and thus the bench might temporarily be deprived of one of its ornaments. If Judge Mahan is as good a man as he ought to be I hope he will more frequently visit us and learn something of the growing disillusionment of this community. On his last visit, in his haste to obey the privately conducted District Attorney he appeared to be somewhat in the nature of an anachronism.

Legislation Inspired by Local Scandals

Our experts in penology and sociology must be sorely disappointed over the outcome of their agitation for the reformation of the criminal code. A few months ago they were clamoring for new laws to make it more difficult for an accused person to establish his innocence, but the tendency of legislation has been in the opposite direction. This is what might have been expected in view of the extraordinary methods that have been pursued by concienceless officials who have made it clear that as it is possible to prostitute the machinery of the law to private vengeance the existing safeguards of personal liberty are entirely inadequate. Several measures were passed at the recent session of the legislature for the purpose of holding in check unscrupulous officials of the type of those that have been making themselves odious in this city. One of them was signed the other day by Governor Gillett. It requires that all testimony given before a grand jury shall be taken down by a stenographer. The inspiration of this measure was the action of Francis J. Heney in dismissing the official stenographer from the grand jury room just as Abe Ruef was about to give his testimony in the Calhoun case. This action is accounted for on the theory that Ruef's testimony had not been ripened by the artificial process invented by our civic patriots. Another measure framed in the interest of accused persons was the change of venue bill, the desirability of which has been made manifest by two judges who have exhibited a singular insensibility to the impropriety of presiding over the trial of cases in which they had taken a deep personal interest. In many of the States of the Union the importance of the principle of the change-of-venue bill is recognized, but Governor Gillett refused to sign the bill because he thought it might work hardship on litigants in civil cases. The bill will of course be amended and passed by the next legislature.

REFLECTIONS OF QUEEN CARMEN SYLVA

Translated from the French

Often the virtue of a woman must be great indeed, for it must suffice for two.

Women are said to be unjust; because they are impressionable; but impressions are often more just than is judgment. It is a case of the jury and the judge.

In her children, a woman fights above all against the faults of her husband and those of his family.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Grain.—Most of the statistical information for the week was bullish. World's shipments were smaller than estimated; a fair decrease in wheat on passage; a decrease of 3,000,000 in the visible supply; a decrease by Bradstreets in world's stocks of nearly 9,000,000 bushels, of which about 3,500,000 was east of the Rockies in this country; a decrease in Minneapolis and Duluth stocks of over 1,600,000 bushels for the week; a decided drop in Northwest receipts; a falling off in the Chicago receipts of a few cars a day, and on two different days no wheat at all. Taking out the wheat receipts here by lake from Duluth the primary movement was down under 150,000 bushels at times. That the market did not make better response to the bullish figures on receipts and stocks was due to good rains over the entire winter wheat belt during the last half of the week. The situation in Kansas and other portions of the Southwest had become somewhat critical because of drought and when the relief came the effect was quite bearish. At the close of the week Texas points were predicting new wheat available by June 15th. We think that excellent bullish influence will be brought to play next week.

Cotton.—Those who have been faithful to the bull side of cotton were handsomely rewarded for their patience by the unexpected and sensational advance of three dollars per bale which occurred the past week. This advance was no doubt brought about and greatly facilitated by the numerous and unmistakable signs of returning prosperity the world over, and it is generally conceded that we have at least turned the corner, and are once again on the way to normal business conditions. Much speculation is rife over the forthcoming Government report on acreage and condition due June 3rd. Little attention has been given the subject of acreage, and leading professional opinion is that there will be no reduction outside of the boll weevil territory, and that this may be made good by increases in other sections where advancing prices and prospects of a short yield in Texas will stimulate planting. It would therefore be surprising if the Government's report showed an actual reduction in States east of Mississippi, but it is not impossible that this will be done. Farmers are learning each year that it is more economical to get one bale from one acre than one bale from two acres, and while there is a small normal increase in the land cultivated each year it is no longer true that this is going each year to cotton. Within recent years other crops than cotton have become profitable to the Southern farmer. The price of grain, hay, feedstuffs of all kinds and truck is and has been high for three years. All of it has found a ready market, at the same time cotton has sold well down from the level which stimulated the enormous planting of 1904 when the crop made its record. The balance of prices has swung toward grains and away from cotton. Hence without any change in human nature as exemplified on the cotton plantation it is possible to get a small reduction in acreage aside from the boll weevil. The condition figures will be made up as of May 25th. The report will compare with 79.7 last year, when conditions were really very fine, and 70.5 in 1907, when they were very poor. Last year's condition report was too low and this year's figures will be lower. A condition therefore, of 75 this year would really mean a greater decrease from last year's standard than the 4.7 per cent indicated in the figures. But it is premature to speculate now on the outcome. Two weeks of good or bad weather may change everything. It is well to bear in mind that if June condition is low the July report will be likewise so, as the crop has never in one month recovered from a bad beginning. The following tabulation will prove instructive in connection with the report:

Year	Acreage	Condition			Crop
		June	July	Oct.
1903	28,015,000	74.1	77.1	65.1	10,011,000
1905	28,000,000	77.2	77.	71.2	11,346,000
1907	32,060,000	70.5	72.	67.7	11,375,000

The probabilities ahead of the market for the next two weeks lie almost wholly with the weather. If that is favorable it will be difficult to continue the advance in front of the condition report. On the other hand if conditions are bad or even scarcely satisfactory it is possible in anticipation of a low June condition and a decrease in acreage to get an advance before the figures are issued.

Stocks.—There seemed to be little interest to report in the Wall Street situation for the past week. Railroad stocks made a new high record since the panic of 1907 and with a consequent reaction at the close of business Saturday, it is quite logical now that the higher stocks work, the sharper the recessions will be, which is significant of profit-taking on good news. The important sustaining factor now is the more favorable outlook for better crops, and with the nearness of tariff matter being closed we shall find the incentive for great industrial activity.

Social Prattle

By TANTALUS

She Was so Angry!

It is not every woman who can remain "mistress of herself though China fall," and comparatively few are capable of bearing with equanimity the minor mishaps to toilet and possessions. Some few are capable of preserving a heroic front in public when they are made the victims of accident or awkwardness, but they are few and far between, even amongst the fashionable herd. A proof of this was one of the incidents of the Newhall-McBean wedding, when a matron of social prominence sailed gracefully up the aisle on the arm of an usher, her debutante daughter following close behind, too intent on singling out and bowing to her friends to heed her steps. Her dainty foot was presently firmly planted on mamma's sweeping train, and notwithstanding time, place and circumstances, the elder lady turned on the offender such a glance of withering rage as must have shriveled her soul at the edges. An audible titter from those who witnessed the scene added to the discomfiture of the maid and the wrath of the matron.

What Made Him Laugh?

Curiosity was rife at the Newhall-McBean wedding the other day as to just what tip Mrs. ——— gave the colored man who drove her to the house. That she handed him something upon alighting from the carriage, everyone saw, and the man took it respectfully, with an expression of gratitude. Then he glanced down into the palm of his hand and suddenly he went off into squeals and peals of laughter. As the next carriage drove up to the door he moved on, "What tip did she give him," whispered one debutante to another, "Ten dollars, or ten cents? He's howling his head off!" "Most likely ten cents," returned the other debutante with a demure smile, "It was Mrs. ———, you know!"

Ostracism Advocated

At the meeting of the Woman's Press Club last week an amusing incident occurred. The question of divorce was under discussion, and one little lady whose long suit is probably domestic virtue was hurling platitudes at the assemblage denouncing divorcee's and advocating the adoption of the plan of Queen Victoria—social ostracism for the divorced woman. She spoke on—and on—totally oblivious of the fact that at least half a dozen of those present had parted with their husbands via the divorce court. One Spartan spinster at last came to the rescue. "Such a process of elimination," she said, "would be impossible in San Francisco society because all the 'clever' women in its ranks are divorcee's."

Not the Marriage That Was Expected

Down the peninsula there is a good deal of gossip anent the marriage of Margaret Walker and Roul Smoot Jr. of Salt Lake City. When Miss Walker bade goodbye to her friends in San Mateo some months ago it was supposed that she was the fiancee of David Bellamore who went to the gold fields of South Africa about a year ago. They were expected to be married this summer. After the failure of the California Safe Deposit and Trust Company and the exoneration of David Walker the family went to Salt Lake for a few months' visit. It was in that city that the marriage of Margaret Walker and young Smoot was quietly celebrated. The Smoots are spending their honeymoon in San Mateo where Mrs. Smoot is very popular. Her friends, I hear, warmly approve of the groom who is a fine manly fellow, and they have forgotten all about the rumored Bellamore romance. The Walker home is one of the show places of

Genuine Philanthropy

An affair of more than ordinary importance, whether viewed from the point of society or economics, was the reception and tea at which Mrs. William H. Crocker entertained some two hundred guests at the Fairmont on Saturday afternoon last. Mrs. Crocker is one of the rare few of the wealthy who contributes not only from her purse but from her heart as well, and her interest in philanthropic projects is not confined to the moment. It will be remembered that the very desirable location on Nob Hill which was occupied by the Crocker residence before the fire was given outright to the Episcopal Church at the very time when other millionaires were bewailing their losses and scraping the under side of their burned bricks for possible increment. The Crocker philanthropy is not of the kind which drops a nickel and passes on, but takes the form of helping people to help themselves, and this elaborate entertainment was but a side interest to the discussion of the theme of "Permanent Philanthropy." The speakers on this occasion were Miss Jessica Peixotto, who told something of the need of settlement work and influences. Miss Peixotto was one of the earliest investigators in the field of social science, and her broad theoretic knowledge was ably seconded by the address of Miss Octavine Briggs, whose eleven years of practical experience south of Market street qualified her to speak of the difficulties, financial and other, which are encountered in settlement work, and made an appeal for regular monthly subscriptions with which to carry out her plans more fully than has been possible hitherto. Miss Briggs is now the head of the Nurse's Settlement at the Potrero, a theme which gave Walter Macarthur an opportunity to pay tribute to the nurses who have given freely of their time, sympathy and hard work. There is nothing spectacular about settlement service. It does not thrive on occasional spurts of enthusiasm, but demands steady, all the year round devotion without reward in the shape of public recognition. After the formal lectures, tea was served in the white and gold ball room in which small tables were arranged with a view to promoting intimate discussion among the guests. Mrs. Crocker, beautifully gowned, was assisted in receiving by Mrs. W. H. Taylor. Among those present were Mrs. Carter Pitkin Pomeroy, Mrs. George Pinckard, Mrs. Timothy Hopkins, Miss Lydia Hopkins, Mrs. George Newhall, Mrs. Norman McLaren, Mrs. Francis McComas, Mrs. Phillip Lansdale, Mrs. Charles Eells, Mrs. Louis Parrott, Mrs. Walter McGavin, Miss Dolly McGavin, Mrs. Harry Mendell, Mrs. E. Just a Vulgar Domestic Row

To husband a rich woman, I have heard it said, is one of the toughest occupations that a man can follow. Of this I was reminded the other night by an after-theatre scene enacted on a public highway by a fashionable couple of the inner circle of exclusives. As their automobile stopped in front of a cafe where they were to indulge in a late supper an altercation arose, and so loud were the tones in which they disputed that bystanders had no difficulty in learning of the question at issue. The lady who is somewhat noted for her temper was in favor of spending the night at a fashionable hotel. Hubby had resolved upon returning home. Madame was in a terrible rage and her manner was that of a tragedy queen. A large crowd collected before the painful scene drew to a close. There was no compromise. The supper was called off, Madame went to the hotel, hubby took another machine and presumably went to his home.

A Brilliant Wedding

The wedding of Miss Margaret Newhall and Athole McBean may be said to have closed the social season, since many remained in town solely to attend the affair and others, who motored up from the Peninsula, returned at once to their country homes. In the church as well as at the house, the floral decorations were exquisite, and a small fortune must have been absorbed in this detail alone. Take, for instance, the bouquet of gardenias and pink wistaria which was carried by Miss Marion Newhall. A popular florist assures me that a single bud of gardenia costs seventy-five cents, so those mathematically inclined may figure out for themselves the cash value of the shower bouquet which fell to the bottom of her dress. The wedding was easily the most brilliant affair of its kind which San Francisco has witnessed for many a day. The bride was cool and collected, and looked dignified and stately as she walked down the aisle on the arm of her father, and after the ceremony she bowed a sweet acknowledgment to the admiring glances of her friends. When the newly married pair were about to depart from the house everyone was on the qui vive to intercept them, lest they should escape from the attentions usually lavished on brides and grooms. The carriage had been decorated with tin cans, old shoes and other distinguishments, and it was determined that the young couple should be liberally showered with rice. A bevy had gathered in the hall way, prepared for their part in the ordeal, when somebody caught sight of a suit case at the turn of the stairs, and a warning voice proclaimed, "Here she comes!" In the excitement which followed the grains were liberally bestowed, not on the foredoomed pair but on Sing, the Chinese cook, who bowed a smiling acknowledgment to the attention and proceeded on his way to the waiting carriage where he deposited his burdens. A merry war of buds and roses was the result of the time-honored custom of catching the bride's bouquet, which, in this unique instance, fell into the hands of two, Miss Mary Keeney and Miss Jean Gallois. Neither was willing to accept the full responsibility, but divided the flowers equally. So numerous were the wedding gifts that it required two or three rooms on one of the upper floors of the mansion to display them. The McBeans departed on Thursday morning for their honeymoon, which will be extended until August, when they will return to San Francisco.

Society in Theatricals for Church Benefit

The entertainment for the benefit of St. Paul's church in San Rafael was quite an important event in that exclusive burg. It took place at the Garden Theatre on May 18th, and crowded the house to its capacity, for all the ladies of social prominence were interested in the success of the venture and each exerted herself to that end. Miss Inez Dibblee, prominent in the society of Santa Barbara, gave several Spanish and classic dances, in the latter of which she was accompanied by Miss Katherine Grey as pianist, Miss McKenzie as violinist and Miss Rogers as cellist. Harold Pracht, the baritone, rendered several excellent vocal numbers and Miss Katherine Gray was equally obliging at the piano. The trio in E minor with Evon Langstroth at the piano, Miss Rogers, cellist, and Mrs. Hughes, violinist, was enthusiastically received. Mrs. Alexander S. Lilley was the moving spirit and director general of the entertainment. The affair attracted the attention of wealth, fashion and society from all around the bay, and not only filled the theatre, but netted a handsome sum for the beneficiary.

Club Women at Del Monte

The big event at Del Monte this week was the meeting of the California State Federation of Women's Clubs. Mrs. James B. Hume, the president, accompanied by Miss Blanche Morse, secretary of the organization, arrived on Saturday, and by Monday the delegates poured in by scores and dozens and hundreds. The formal opening of the convention did not take place until Wednesday morning, but all the delegates, with their friends, had arrived by Tuesday evening, when a musicale and reception was held which enabled the representatives from all sections of the State to become acquainted. Del Monte is an ideal place for holding these, and for that matter, all gatherings. As Mrs. Hume enthusiastically said: "It is such an advantage to have the ladies all under one roof. They have no excuse for wearing diabolical hats nor for being late to the sessions, so we can begin on time. The art gallery provides us with a spacious convention hall, and everything works together for our comfort." In these days, when there are clubs for every conceivable purpose, even clubs to oppose the extension of women's clubs, the "Down and Out Club" is almost a matter of course, though the reason and occasion for its organization is a little story in itself. According to Mrs. Hume it came into being several years ago when, on their return from the annual meeting, the train by which the delegates were traveling was detained near Bakersfield until the small hours of the morning, "But what a good time we did have! It was there the Down and Out Club was organized. Only ex-officers of the State board are eligible to membership." This year the club joined the Federation and on Thursday night it celebrated with a banquet at which the speeches were something worth hearing. No pains were spared to make this tenth annual meeting a distinguished occasion. On Thursday Miss Calthea Vivian, recently returned from abroad, gave a talk on California artists, and as all meetings were held in the art gallery, the listeners had but to turn their heads for illustrations of her words. Mrs. Frances Squire Potter, professor of English literature at the University of Minnesota, was the most distinguished speaker at the convention. She has never before visited the coast, but her reputation as a writer and speaker is international. She was decidedly the "Eastern star." "Doing Politics in Washington and Sacramento" was the theme on which Mrs. Lovell White gave an amusing and instructive discourse. Mrs. White, it will be remembered, was the chief worker on behalf of the salvation of the Calaveras Big Trees. She displayed the gold pen with which President Roosevelt signed the bill which preserves them. Mrs. Lillian Harris Coffin told of her efforts in Sacramento on behalf of the equal suffrage bill, but, as she humorously states, instead of "bringing home the sheaves," it was mostly chaff that she garnered. A stereopticon lecture on the Glories of the Sierras is reserved for this Saturday evening. Herbert W. Gleason will be the speaker, and his lantern slides are reputed to surpass anything ever before seen on the coast. The local clubs in and about Del Monte all had planned festivities for the entertainment of the delegates, the most interesting of which were the visits to the landmarks in the vicinity. Such an enthusiastic and instructive gathering as this proved to be is confidently expected to increase the popularity of the woman's club.

Californian Wooed and Won in Dresden

Recent reports from abroad give news of the engagement of Miss Mattie Livermore, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Horatio P. Livermore, and Herr Alfred Hurtgen of Dresden. The Livermores are of old and prominent California stock. They bestowed their name on Livermore Valley. Mrs. Livermore went abroad several months ago, accompanied by her daughter, Miss Elizabeth and Miss Hazel King, and were joined in Dresden by Miss Mattie and Miss Edith Livermore, who have been studying there for several years. Miss Mattie is a talented musician, and it was while pursuing her studies that she met Herr Hurtgen, who holds a high place in the musical world. The wedding will take place in Dresden, after which the Livermores will return to San Francisco.

Progeny of Pioneers to Wed

The recently announced engagement of Miss Helen Baker and Drummond McGavin is eminently pleasing to the parents of both the young people. Miss Baker is the daughter of Mrs. and the late L. L. Baker, and granddaughter of the late Rev. Dr. Stone, one of the pioneer Congregational ministers of the city, whose church was the temple in which worshipped the wealth, fashion and exclusiveness of early days. Miss Baker is a graduate of a New York finishing school. Her formal education was completed by a long tour abroad. Her sister, Miss Dorothy, is now in Europe under the chaperonage of her aunt, Miss Kate Stone. The sons of the family, Ralph, Herbert and Leavitt, are well known amongst the younger set. Drummond MacGavin is the only son of Mr. and Mrs. Walter MacGavin, and brother of Miss Dollie MacGavin, whose own engagement is expected soon to be announced. Young MacGavin is regarded as an exceptionally bright fellow. He is a graduate of the University of California, class of '04, and a noted tennis expert, having held the championship of the Pacific Coast, California and San Francisco, and representative of the university with the distinction of never having been defeated by Stanford. The wedding of the senior MacGavins took place at Trinity church and was in its day a fashionable affair. Mrs. MacGavin, who was Miss Kate Henshelwood, was a ward of Dr. MacGavin, uncle of Walter MacGavin. She was brought up in Paris, and when she came to California, stopped with Colonel and Mrs. Eyre from whose home she was married. She has always been an authority on things musical, and has a voice of rare quality which has been well cultivated. For several years, actuated solely from love of the art, she has imparted instruction amongst the fashionables, and has now a number of disciples who are far advanced. She has a distinct French style, and, as is natural for one brought up in that country, and acquiring the tongue as a matter of course, speaks with a decided accent. Mr. MacGavin is a tall, fine looking Scot who carries his years gracefully. He was connected with the Nevada Bank for years but is at present with the Anglo California.

Wedding Arrangements Accelerated

The wedding of Miss Bessie-Louise Dichman and Thurman Harrison Bane, Lieutenant of the Fourteenth Cavalry, which will be quietly celebrated at the residence of the bride's aunt, Mrs. George J. Bucknall, at three o'clock on Saturday afternoon, May 29th, will come as a great surprise to friends just now, as it was scheduled to take place later in the season and was to have been a large and brilliant affair. Family circumstances and the exigencies of army life have necessitated the change in plans, for Mrs. Dichman, the mother of the bride, has been suddenly called abroad on business which will detain her for an indefinite period, while Lieutenant Bane is under orders for the Philippines in the fall. The fact that Mrs. Bucknall is in mourning will necessitate a quiet wedding with only relatives and intimate friends present, but none the less it will be a dainty and artistic affair. The father of the groom will officiate, and the bridesmaids will be Miss Louise Bryant, a cousin of the bride, and Miss Bethel Bane, a sister of the groom, while Lieutenant Harry Pfeil, a classmate of the groom, will be best man. The bride will wear a handsome gown of white satin garnished with rare lace, and will carry a bouquet of lilies of the valley. The attendants will also be in white, embroidered mull over yellow satin, with yellow shower bouquets, the color being made prominent out of compliment to the branch of the service with which the groom is affiliated. After the ceremony there will be a short honeymoon trip, then a temporary residence at Sequoia National Park, where Lieutenant Bane is now stationed, and finally a journey to the far Philippines.

The King-Harris Engagement

Miss Lucie King had completed her arrangements for a long tour abroad with Mrs. Fuller, when she suddenly changed her mind and announced her engagement to Lawrence W. Harris, a suitor of long standing. On Wednesday last she was a figure of importance second only to the bride of the day, Miss Newhall, as she stood in the vestibule of Trinity church and received the felicitations showered upon her, for she is not only prominent but popular in society. She is the only

Mr. Harris is a popular bachelor, a brother of Mrs. Andrew Carrigan, who was Bessie Harris, and a member of the firm of Ames, Harris and Neville, of which he is the vice-president. He is one of the quartette which has been occupying Mrs. Ben Lathrop's flat on Pierce street for the last year, Roy Pike, George Fuller and Robert Eyre being the others of the coterie. I hear that the premises will be vacated when the wedding takes place in the fall, as no one else could possibly assume the place of "Larry" Harris, who has been the presiding genius of the household and the moving spirit at the pleasant dinners and supper parties which have been enjoyed by Bohemians and friends.

A bridge tournament was held on Friday afternoon for the benefit of an unique undertaking, a fund for the systematic determination of the detested mosquito. It was well attended and a goodly sum netted for the cause. The roster of those sufficiently interested in the abolition of the pests from the vicinity of the hotel is in itself an indication of the renewed popularity of the transbay city. Already the tennis courts are in demand. The annual school tournament was held on May 15th, the schools which competed being the San Rafael High, the Lowell and Lick of San Francisco, the Palo Alto High, the Oakland Manual Training and the Oakland High. The boys' championship was won by M. McLaughlin, State Champion of the Lowell High School. Effective work was done by Miss Roberts and Miss Hewitt of San Rafael, who were winners of the doubles.

In the Social Spotlight

Mrs. Frank P. Anderson was hostess at a luncheon on Monday at the Fairmont, when she entertained Mrs. James Robinson, Mrs. Patrick Calhoun, Mrs. R. P. Schwerein and Miss Laura McKinstry.

Captain Robert Harris, U. S. N., was host at a pleasant dinner at the Fairmont on Monday night, at which a dozen of his friends accepted his hospitality.

Miss Louise Kellogg, daughter of Mrs. M. B. Kellogg of Berkeley, was the hostess at an elaborate bridge party at the Century Club on Tuesday, May 18th. Mrs. Kellogg and Miss Louise leave leave in the near future for a long tour abroad.

A pretty June wedding will take place in St. Peter's Chapel at the Mare Island navy yard on the first day of the month, when Miss Eleanor Phelps, only daughter of Commandant and Mrs. Thomas Stowell Phelps, and Ensign William Glassford Jr., of the torpedo boat Davis of the Pacific Squadron, and son of Colonel W. A. Glassford of the Signal Service at Nome and Seattle, will be united.

The many friends of Miss Helen Dean will regret to learn that she has been for the past three weeks a patient at the Adler Sanitarium. She is rapidly regaining health however, and will return soon to the Hotel Rafael where she will pass the summer with her parents.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Redding, who have been at the Peninsula Hotel for the past two months, have taken a house on Taylor street and will be installed there on the first of June.

Mrs. Thomas R. Hayes is the guest of her daughter, Mrs. Walter Treat, in Berkeley.

Miss Josephine Ellicott, the pretty daughter of Commander Ellicott, U. S. N., is visiting Miss Nell Rauch at her home on Broadway. Mrs. Ellicott and family are making their home at Coronado during the absence of Commander Ellicott with the fleet.

Mrs. Frank Booth, nee Davis, was the hostess at an elaborate luncheon during the week in honor of Mrs. Belknap, wife of former Supreme Judge Belknap of Carson.

News from Stockton chronicles the advent of a little daughter in the household of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Peters, formerly Miss Jessie Fillmore, daughter of the late J. A. Fillmore of the Southern Pacific Railroad.

Mrs. J. Coker Sims and her sister, Miss Blythe McDonald, left the city on Wednesday morning's Overland Limited for New York and the continent. They expect to remain away until next winter.

Mr. and Mrs. R. A. Holcomb have given up their winter quarters in the city and are occupying an attractive house in Belvedere. Mrs. Holcomb was Grace Thompson, a bride of last year.

The Wakefield Bakers have taken a cottage at Castle Crags Farm for the season.

The lawn tennis tournament for the championship of San Mateo and Burlingame will be held on the Peninsula courts during the last week in June. The winner will play Tom Driscoll, present holder of the cup.

Amongst those connected with the "service" now at the Fairmont are Mrs. Uriel Sebree, wife of Rear Admiral Sebree now commanding the Pacific Fleet; Dr. H. H. Lane, U. S. N., and

Amongst the arrivals at the Tavern of Tamalpais for the week ending May 17th were Dr. B. N. Dow, Anna C. Tannar, James S. Rodman, Mrs. Jos. J. Lawless, Mr. and Mrs. H. B. Morris, M C. Harrison, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Jacobs, Herbert N. Caggs and Miss Irene Caggs of San Francisco; Miss Ruth Spencer Stone of London, England

The news that the management of Castle Crags Farm will be in the hands of Mrs. W. F. Morris for this season is causing a great deal of pleasurable anticipation. Mrs. Morris is well known as one of the most successful hotel keepers on the Pacific Coast having established an enviable reputation in her handling of the Hotel Cecil before the fire. The Pacific Improvement Company which owns Castle Crags Farm as well as Hotel Del Monte and Pacific Grove hotels has made a number of improvements on the Castle Crags property since last season. A large assembly hall has been built of heavy logs. This has large fireplaces in each end and a fine dancing floor. From it magnificent views of Mt. Shasta and Castle Crags are obtained. The Grill has been doubled in size and the number of cottages has been increased to twenty-five. These cottages provide ideal accommodations. They are built of pine-logs. Each cottage has two rooms separated by a wide, covered porch. In each room there is a shower bath with hot and cold water, and a great fireplace. From present indications there will be enough people leaving the Bay Cities for Castle Crags Farm about June 1st to warrant a special train. As Memorial Day comes on Sunday and will be observed on Monday this will give a three days' holiday and many business men are planning to join their families in the week-end trip. The round trip railroad fare to Castle Crags is $12.00; sleepers $1.50 each way, making an inexpensive and delightful outing. Mrs. Morris will be at her hotel, the Victoria, corner Bush and Stockton streets until the opening of Castle Crags and there reservations may be made.

MURINE EYE REMEDY CO., Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen:—We have a little fellow four months old who was troubled for three months after birth with sore eyes. A large amount of pus came from them, accompanied with severe inflammation. Our family Doctor, also an Eye Specialist, attended him without relief.

I saw your MURINE EYE REMEDY advertised in one of our Electric Cars, and utterly discouraged, I resolved to try it, and do you know, in three days' time all worry was over. In one week the Sore Eyes were a thing of the past.

This is an unasked for testimonial, but I know you will accept it as it is sent with much gratitude toward MURINE EYE REMEDY.

Yours truly,

Arthur Snow.

The Belasco of the West

Frederic Belasco is branching out as a theatrical manager. During his three months' stay in New York he not only secured the exclusive right for this coast of several of the biggest money-makers in drama, but also perfected arrangements with his brother David by which the latter relinquished to him the guidance of Blanche Bates in her coming western tour. Fred will assume control of the California actress, her company and her play, "The Fighting Hope," in Kansas City, and after presenting them in "syndicate" theatres during the ensuing sixteen weeks will return them to brother David at Omaha. The tour will commence in August, and the Van Ness Theatre has already been booked for the San Francisco engagement. In addition to accomplishing all that, Frederic also enlisted Ben U. Steinman, the Sacramento banker, to finance the construction of a new theatre to be called the Belasco, the plans of which are already under way. Among the plays which will be seen next season at the Alcazar and nowhere else in this city are "The Lion and the Mouse," "Way Down East," "Pierre of the Plains," "Classmates," "The Warrens of Virginia" and "The Offenders." And Belasco will present Florence Roberts in the Alcazar on June 14th for a six weeks' engagement, during which she will appear in "Du Barry," "Becky Sharp," "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," "The Struggle Everlasting" and two others of her favorite vehicles.

John Drew in "Jack Straw" at the Van Ness

John Drew comes to the Van Ness Theatre next Monday night. Mr. Drew's play this season is "Jack Straw," a comedy by W. Somerset Maugham, a British dramatist, whose work is said by discriminating British critics to be well worth watching. From all accounts Mr. Drew hasn't had a more entertaining play for a long time, and the character he himself assumes, that of an eccentric Pomeranian prince, is said to be as well suited to him as if it had been written expressly for him. The critics tell us that the dialogue is witty and clever without ever getting tiresomely brilliant, that the character drawing is masterly, and that there is a vein of gentle satire in the play that is reminiscent of Goldsmith. Mr. Drew is well supported this season. Miss Rose Coghlan who was a star herself in the long ago when stars were not made in a night is with the company. She has the role of a vulgar parvenue of extreme snobbish tendencies. Miss Helen Freeman plays the part of the pretty girl who captures the prince, and there are excellent parts too for Miss Adelaide Prince, Miss Grace Henderson, Edgar L. Davenport, Frank Goldsmith, Lario Majeroni, E. Soldene Powell and Edwin Nicander. The costumes of the ladies, all from the latest Parisian models, are of special interest to feminine theatregoers. During Mr. Drew's engagement which is for two weeks matinees will be given Wednesdays and Saturdays.

The Shuberts at the American

"The Blue Mouse" which will be the opening bill of the Shuberts at the American Theatre June 13th is the farce which caused so much discussion in the East. Although it has been under fire for almost a year New Yorkers seem to like it and are still crowding the Lyric Theatre to see it. The original version which is by two German authors is said to be entirely too frank for American taste but in its present disinfected state it is at least tolerable. Clyde Fitch's adaptation is being received unblushingly and uproariously, and if it is accepted here on equal terms the Shuberts will invade the sacred ground of the trust powerfully equipped. The plot of "The Blue Mouse" is not unlike other farces as it leads up to the old, old case of mistaken identity, yet it keeps you in delightful expectation throughout besides being imperatively, ridiculously laughable. The Shuberts will build two new theatres in San Francisco and pending the construction of these houses arrangements have been entered into play all attractions at the American theatre. Among other offerings to follow "The Blue Mouse" will be James T. Powers in "Havana," Mary Mannering, William Faversham and twenty-six attractions under control of Liebler and Co.

"Peggy From Paris"

The Princess management announces that next Monday night will be produced that famous musical comedy hit "Peggy From Paris" which will be sumptuously staged. Fred Mace and May Boley will be provided with congenial roles and Marie Nelson, an Eastern prima donna of whom report speaks highly, will make her first appearance. Zoe Barnett, James Stevens, Budd Ross, Reginald Travers, Bert Phoenix and the remainder of the Princess Company including the Beauty Chorus will be afforded full opportunity to distinguish themselves. "Piff Paff Pouf" will be given for the last times this Sunday afternoon and night.

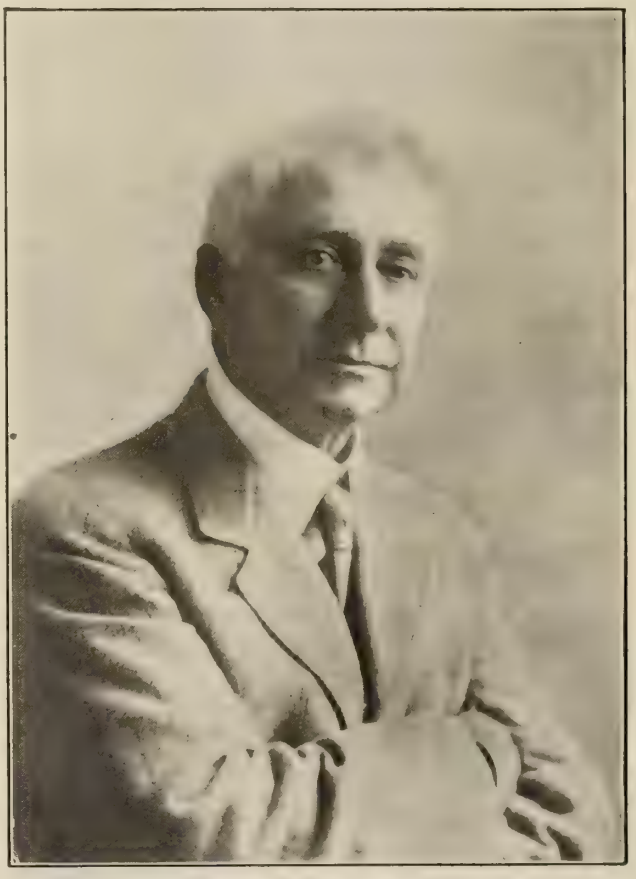
Lytell as John Storm



Bertram Lytell's last week as leading man of the Alcazar players opens next Monday evening when he will appear as John Storm in "The Christian," a role in which he scored one of his greatest successes in the East. It is needless to say that the closing performances of this clever and popular actor will be witnessed by capacity-taxing audiences, for during his two years in San Francisco he has made a host of friends who will undoubtedly give him a rousing send-off. Evelyn Vaughan will play Glory Quayle, a character for which she is exceptionally adapted by both art and temperament, and the entire strength of the Alcazar company and many extra people will be in the cast. No other play of religious savor has retained popularity so long as "The Christian," a fact that vindicates its dramatic worth.

Orpheum Vaudeville

The Orpheum announces a novel and captivating programme for next week. "The Sunny South," the headliner is presented by ten colored comedians with most picturesque and appropriate stage settings. Peter Donald and Meta Carson will present a short comedy sketch which just now when "thistle" humor is so popular, is most timely. It is called "Alex McLeans Dream" and abounds in Scotch songs, dances and wit. Mr. Donald is a genuine Scotch comedian who enjoys an immense popularity in Edinboro Town and other Caledonian cities, while Miss Carson is a bonnie lassie who sings the songs of her native land and performs her national dances charmingly. Lew Sully, one of the best minstrel comedians in this or any other country, will indulge in what he calls "Words and Music," which introduces many of his latest song hits including "Adam Was a Lucky Man," "The Merry Widow Craze," "Wise Old Robinson Crusoe" and "Back to Italy." The Baader-La Velle Trio, new comers on the Orpheum Circuit, will give a daring and original bicycle performance, and Myles McCarthy, the popular comedian, with the assistance of Pauline Palmer, will introduce a ludicrous skit called "Imagination." Next week will conclude the engagement of the Countess Rossi and Monsieur Paula, Flo Adler and the Lulu Beeson Trio. A new series of Motion Pictures specially imported for the Orpheum Circuit will be a fitting finale to a splendid vaudeville entertainment.

Dream Comedy at Ye Liberty

Next week at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, the Bishop players will offer the theatregoers of across the bay their first opportunity of enjoying "The Road to Yesterday," the strange and fantastical comedy in which White Whittlesey and Minnie Dupree enjoyed an all season's run at the Herald Square Theatre, New York, not so very long ago. This comedy has been pronounced most original and delightful. It deals with the adventures of a young twentieth century American girl in London, a girl whose mind is filled with thoughts of olden time heroes and heroines, thoughts inspired by the popular novels of the day and the wonderful deeds enacted upon the stage by matinee heroes. Upon reaching London she visits nearly a guide book full of historical places, and wishes that she could go back to the days when there were real heroes and heroines. Her wish is gratified, and the next two acts find her playing an important part in the life of the seventeenth century, surrounded by her relatives and friends who with her have been transported back three hundred years. The last act sees the young lady in her own twentieth century, and find her satisfied that the present age is much more comfortable to live in than the so-called age of chivalry. The dream is enacted in the most startling manner and the lines and situations are full of the most delicate humor. Helen Holmes, who is fast becoming a big favorite at Ye Liberty will have the role of the young dreamer, and all the other favorites will be found in congenial roles. As usual, the scenery and costumes will be of the highest order. "The Great Divide" is announced to follow, commencing with a special matinee on Decoration Day.

"The Man From Mexico"

The last performances of Arthur Sidman's delightful pastoral comedy-drama, "York State Folks," will take place at the Valencia Theatre this Sunday afternoon and evening, and on Monday night the ever popular farce that has made millions laugh, "The Man From Mexico," by H. B. Du Souchet, author of "My Friend From India," and first made famous by Willie Collier, will be staged in capital style. In New York recently, the so-called co-author of a play in which Willie Collier has been starring, remarked to the comedian: "Say, Willie, I'll give you a hundred dollars if you'll find one of my lines in our play." "Nothing doing," said Collier, "but I'll give you a hundred if you'll find one that either of us wrote in the play at the beginning." The aecdote tells with a fair amount of accuracy what happens when Collier puts a play into rehearsal. His only idea is to get laughs, and while there is no doubt of his great success in his ambition, it is also true that he never fails to preserve a real story to carry his humor. "The Man From Mexico" is one of his greatest successes and no doubt much of its merit is attributable to the author, but there is no question but that the majority of the laughs owe their origin to Collier's nimble wit. The story of Fitzhew and his wife, who have both been caught in the raid of a certain resort, but under different circumstances and with different degrees of culpability, and of their several and various attempts to throw each other off the track, is the foundation of the farce. How Fitzhew goes to Blackwell's Island, almost voluntarily, to avoid his wife's questions, and how she pursues him there, only to become more deeply involved in her own deception, is the theme on which the three rattling acts are laid. There isn't a dull moment in the piece and when Fitzhew and his wife are not the mainsprings of the humor, there are Schmidt, the German; Louis, the Italian, and Daunton, Farrer and Loveall, and more than any of these, the inventive and prevaricating Majors, to keep the fun going. Paul McAllister is practicing the lockstep for the part of the imprisoned Fitzhew and George Osbourne will have full swing for his splendid comedy ability in the part of Majors. Always reliable Robert Homans will be Loveall, the amusing warden, Charles Dow Clark will play Schmidt, Edward Clisbee, who has done some splendid work lately, will be Louis the Italian, and Gerald Harcourt, Robert McKim, William Wolbert, Edmund W. Bracht and Gilmore Walker will furnish the remainder of the male comedy support. Florence Oakley will be Mrs. Fitzhew and the Misses Travers, Lytle and Andrews will have the capital parts of Nettie, Sallie and Miranda. The three acts are programed "Ice Water," "Warm Water" and "Hot Water" and the action takes place in the Fitzhew's drawing room and in the Warden's office at Blackwell's Island.

In the Limelight

Nat C. Goodwin and Edna Goodrich will give their final performance of "The Genius" on Sunday night at the Van Ness Theatre. The comedy is one of the best laugh producers of the season.

Following John Drew at the Van Ness Theatre will be seen Miss Ethel Barrymore in her newest comedy, "Lady Frederick" which was written by the author of "Jack Straw." Bruce McRae will be Miss Barrymore's leading man. Many well known names appear in the list of players.

George Foster Platt, whose direction of the stage at the Valencia Theatre is the talk of people interested in theatrical productions, has just been engaged by Lee Schubert to assume the direction of the famous New Theatre, New York City, which will be opened August 1st. This position is, without exception, the finest of the kind in America and since accepting the offer Mr. Platt has been in receipt of a score of congratulatory telegrams from prominent theatrical and newspaper folk all over the country. While the Valencia management will feel its loss keenly, it is no small honor for the local playhouse to be able to furnish the director for America's representative theatre.

Miss Marie Doro, who, besides achieving stellar honors under the management of Mr. Charles Frohman is continually engaged in other lines of activity has undertaken to write a series of stories about the Yukon Exposition at Seattle for a well known syndicate. Miss Doro comes here with her success, "The Morals of Marcus."

It is just six weeks hence that "The Merry Widow" will make her bow at the Van Ness Theatre for the first time on the Pacific Coast. She is sure of a great reception for theatregoers are already applying for seats.

The announcement that Arthur Cunningham, the favorite baritone and Irish actor, is to appear again at the Valencia Theatre in a series of Celtic plays, has been greeted with great enthusiasm by his thousands of admirers of this city. He will begin a limited engagement Monday evening, May 31st, in Dion Boucicault's famous romantic play, "The Colleen Bawn," in which he will introduce a number of songs, including "The Cruiskeen Lawn," "The West's Awake" and "The Old Plaid Shawl." Mr. Cunningham will be supported by all the members of the Valencia Stock Company and it is safe to say that "The Colleen Bawn" will receive the best production ever accorded in San Francisco.

During the John Drew, Ethel Barrymore and Marie Doro engagements at the Van Ness Theatre, matiness will be given on Wednesdays and Saturdays.

Billie Burke has made a decided success in London with her production of "Love Watches."

Not being very familiar with the intricacies of these financial matters, nor particularly interested in the Spreckels method of milking the goat of the public service corporations, I paid little attention to the drift of Witness Phelan's testimony. I was largely absorbed in comtemplation of the extraordinary beauty of the feminine representatives of the League of Justice occupying the front seats reserved for them in the auditorium of the courtroom. But I was struck by Witness Phelan's excessive admiration for Claus Spreckels whom he seemed to regard as the greatest philanthropist that ever happened to the gas consumers of San Francisco, as he had specified this same Spreckels as the greatest philanthropist that had ever bestowed the beneficence of his vast bounty on the Rubes of the San Joaquin Valley. I heard him say that Claus Spreckels had forced the price of gas down from $1.35 a thousand to $1, and I heard Mr. Heney ask him to calculate the unnumbered millions of dollars that had been saved to the gas consumers by this generous benefactor. I was surprised, therefore, when Mr. Heney arose in furious wrath to protest against the effort of the lawyers for the defense to prove by this witness that Claus Spreckels was the greatest philanthropist and benefactor that ever happened to California.

The assistant district attorney, with an eloquence that would have done no discredit to Demosthenes in his fourth phillipic, denounced the cross-examination of Witness Phelan as "defamation of the dead," and in clarion tones he declared that he was there to defend the good name of not only Claus Spreckels, dead and turning to clay; but he was in that forum to protect the reputation of all the Spreckelses and to save even James D. Phelan from obloquy and contumely. I say that I was surprised at this bold and unequivocal announcement by the assistant district attorney that he was not primarily the attorney for the people, but was the special advocate of the Spreckels family and James D. Phelan. I looked in the daily newspapers the next day for sensational headlines conveying this startling information to the people, but there was not even mention of the fact. I am compelled, therefore, to the conclusion that the newspapers take it for granted that the citizens of San Francisco are thoroughly well-informed concerning the real purpose of Mr. Heney in this and other cases comprising what is called the "graft prosecution." To have printed the speech of Mr. Heney in full-face type under seven-column headlines, would have been a repetition of stale news.

Another thing that impressed me during my visits to the courtroom. I observed that Judge Lawlor never sustained the objections of the lawyers for the defense and that he invariably upheld the objections of the prosecution; and that the general trend of all his rulings was against the defense and in favor of the prosecution. I take it that Judge Lawlor, who is unquestionably one of the greatest jurists that ever sat on a bench, has a very poor opinion of the legal knowledge of the lawyers for the defense, and that he thinks Mr. Heney and Mr. O'Gara are some pumpkins in law lore. Of course, in comparison with Judge Lawlor himself, even the attorneys for Spreckels and Phelan are only squashes, but when these attorneys are compared with such lawyers as the Moores, Alexander King, J. J. Barrett, Earl Rogers and H. W. Byington the latter must be content to enter the cucumber class of polypetalous dicotyledonous lawyers.

There were other things that impressed me during my visits to this courtroom, but I do not care to mention them. It would be justifiable contempt of court.

Auto Notes

Word has been received by the Pioneer Automobile Company that the Chalmers-Detroit thirty which is acting as the pathfinding car for the Flag to Flag contest, is now fairly on its way from Denver to the City of Mexico. Governor Shafroth of Colorado gave the car its start at the Colorado State Capitol last Saturday afternoon, and it has been steadily plugging its way toward El Paso ever since. Colorado Springs was reached the first day. An easy run to Pueblo was accomplished the second day, and La Junta and Trinidad were passed in order on the following day. It is expected that the car will be ready to cross the Mexican border inside of a week.

Anent the much talked of recent Studebaker E-M-F deal, Hayden Eames, general manager of the Studebaker automobile company says: "We have no ambition to control the policy of the E-M-F company. The success achieved by that concern in ten months under the management of W. E. Flanders surely is the best endorsement of his administration. All the Studebakers want is a sufficient quantity of the best cars it is possible to build for the price to supply the needs of our big sales organization. In buying the holdings of Everitt and Metzger we did it not because we desire to dominate the E-M-F company but simply to clear the atmosphere and carry forward our plans. The car will retain its identity, as it will continue to be called the Studebaker E-M-F '30.' There is no intention to discard or supplant any dealer who is at present handling Studebaker E-M-F '30-s,'—on the contrary, it is our purpose to retain as many as desire to continue and who will fall in with our sales policy."

One of the most extensive tours of the season is planned by C. A. Littlefield of Oakland. In their 60 horsepower Thomas Flyer, Mr. and Mrs. Littlefield will travel from Oakland to Portland, Me., by way of Los Angeles, New Orleans and Washington. The return journey will be made by way of Buffalo, Chicago, and thence along the route which will be followed by the New York to Seattle Trans-continental race. The itinerary has been carefully mapped out, and the car thoroughly equipped for the arduous journey. The start will be made soon and the Littlefields expect to spend practically the entire summer in making the extensive tour which they have planned.

F. W. Miller, the hustling automobile enthusiast of Santa Cruz, has been appointed agent for Santa Cruz County for the lines handled by the Pioneer Automobile Company, and left here last Sunday with a thirty horsepower Chalmers-Detroit touring car to be used as a demonstrator. Other demonstrating cars will follow as soon as they arrive from the factory. Mr. Miller is well known throughout Santa Cruz County and looks forward to having big success with the Chalmers-Detroit, Oldsmobile and Thomas cars.

Mr. Reddington who is making the trip on the Thomas Pathfinder from New York to Seattle, reports from Boice that up to the time he had left the car at Twin Falls, Idaho, not one particle of trouble had occurred to the Diamond Tires and Marsh Rims which equipped the machine, and that the original New York air was still in the tires. Considering the exceptionally strenuous conditions the car has had to contend with on its run so far, the service of Diamond Tires and Marsh Rims is truly remarkable.

"Doctor, my poor husband is very ill, is he not?"

"Yes, madame."

"Please, doctor, when you are sure that there is no hope left, let me know, but in such a way that I won't understand."

OF INTEREST TO OLD SOLDIERS OR THEIR HEIRS

Certain Old Soldiers Have Land Claims Coming to Them From the Government

Any old Union Soldier or Sailor who served 90 days or longer in the late War of the Rebellion, and who went west after the war and made a homestead entry in any state in the Union for either 40, 80 or 120 acres before June 22, 1874, has a claim coming to him from the Government. It does not make any difference whether he proved up on his homestead entry or simply left it.

There are thousands of old soldiers who went to Kansas and Nebraska after the war and took up eighty acre homesteads and when the grasshoppers and hot winds came along simply left their entries and went back east. Each of these men have claims. Under a Supreme Court decision these claims are assignable. R. H. Peale, Judge Building, Salt Lake City, Utah, perfects the title to these claims and will pay the highest market price for same. If the soldier is dead the widow or heirs can sell this right. If a soldier never made an entry he has nothing to sell.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY MORTGAGE SHOULD NOT BE RENEWED

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California—No. 7168. Dept. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of CHARLOTTE F. CLARKE, Deceased.

Upon reading and filing the petition of Charles G. Lyman, executor of the Last Will and Testament of CHARLOTTE F. CLARKE, deceased,

It is ordered that all persons interested in said estate be and appear before this court in the courtroom thereof, in the Grant Building, on the southeast corner of Market and Seventh Streets, San Francisco, California, on Wednesday, the 16th day of June, 1909, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m. of said day, then and there to show cause, if any they have, why the said Charles G. Lyman as such executor should not make, execute and deliver to James Otis, trustee under the will of A. C. Whitcomb, deceased, a promissory note in writing for the sum of $45,000, with interest thereon at the rate of seven and one-half per cent per annum gross, and make, execute and deliver to the said James Otis, trustee under the will of A. C. Whitcomb, deceased, a mortgage as security for said promissory note, of the following described real estate:

Neglected History

Three objects will be served in the Portola festival to be celebrated in this city next October. It will put money in our purse; it will advertise our city, and it will give pleasure to our people. It ought to serve the purpose of familiarizing our citizens with the history of the city and the region in which it lies; but that purpose is not likely to be achieved—the celebration as it is planned is a conglomerate of history, tradition and up-to-date pageantry; there is as yet no settled plan for picturing the events of our history as they were pictured for the people of Quebec when the tri-centennial of the founding of that city was celebrated last year. The historical side of our Portola festival should receive more attention if for no other reason than the instruction of our children in the historical episodes of San Francisco and the bay regions southward to Monterey. It is more than probable that pupils of the local public schools are more familiar with the history of Greece and Rome and New England than they are with the history of California; and it is also probable that they know more about what happened at Runnymede than they know about the founding of the Mission Dolores. This is not said to minimize the importance of knowledge concerning the history of Athens or the history of Rome or the history of the Plymouth colony; but it is the contention here that the public schools should pay some attention to the teaching of local history as well. It is hoped, therefore, that the committee of arrangements for this Portola festival will give prominence to historical details pertaining to the early events surrounding the settlement of this peninsula and the bay region including Monterey where the expedition which resulted in the discovery of San Francisco bay was organized. It is suggested that the material for this feature of the festival may be furnished by the Catholic clergy of San Francisco within whose province lies the events from the founding of the mission St. Francis by the padres to the date of the arrival of the Pioneers after the discovery of gold in 1848. The secular side of the celebration will probably be presented with something like verisimilitude; but the substantial history of San Francisco and Central California from 1775 to 1848 is written in the records of the missions and pueblos and should be presented by those who are most familiar with all the details.

A Profitable Investment

As for the profit of this festival and the pleasure that the people will derive from it, there is no anxiety. Every day during the week of revelry the city will be crowded with visitors from every section of the State and from far beyond our borders. Our own citizens will be for the greater part foot loose from business, and it will be an occasion for lavish expenditure of money. The merchants of San Francisco and all others whose profit is inevitably from the public can well afford to give liberally towards the financial needs of the committees in charge of the arrangements for the fiesta; for the money thus contributed will return many fold. It will be an occasion when San Francisco will surpass herself for hospitality—and when the citizens of San Francisco keep open house they do not count the cost. The spectacular features of the festival are also well assured; there will be no lack of variety in the passing show, no failure in the presentation of striking novelties and picturesque and artistic effects. As the time approaches the interest of the entire community will be concentrated upon the effort to make the great event a success so pronounced that it will become an annual event as the Mardi Gras is an annual festival in New Orleans. In this respect the Portola festival is somewhat experimental, but it is believed that there is sufficient energy, genius and public spirit in San Francisco to repeat the festival annually until it shall be a permanent attraction.

The Le Doux Case

"The Supeme Court," says the Chonicle, has granted a new trial on strictly technical grounds to Emma Le Doux, an undoubtedly bad woman, convicted of the murder of her husband." Though he admits frankly that he has not read the decision the editor of the Chronicle does not scruple at criticizing it and pronouncing judgment thereon. This appears to be the usual way with latter day journalists. They are men of such wonderful acumen, so clairvoyantly alert of intellectual apprehension, that they can expound the most recondite phenomena with which they have not the slightest acquaintance. According to the Chronicle pundit the decision in the Le Doux case is in the nature of cumulative evidence of "the breaking down of criminal justice in this State." The verdict was set aside, he says, because the Sheriff who summoned the jury was an attache of the prosecution. It was absurd to set aside a verdict for such a reason, especially since "it is morally certain that the jury which tried this woman was absolutely impartial." Moreover it is wrong for an appellate court to set aside a verdict if the evidence appears to be conclusive of guilt. We have given some time to an examination of the record in the Le Doux case and we agree with the learned dogmatist of the Chronicle with reference to the moral character of the defendant. She is evidently a very bad woman. But we are not eager to see her hanged. Nor do we think that the setting aside of the verdict is evidence of the breaking down of justice in California. On the contrary with almost the same degree of certainty with which our erudite friend of the Chronicle clings to his opinion we hold that if the verdict had not been set aside the inference would have been justifiable that injustice was sanctioned by the highest court of the State. Furthermore we are convinced that if the suspicion is justified that criminal justice is breaking down in this State it is entirely due to the ignorance and perversity of trial judges and prosecuting officers who, in their passion for record-making, deliberately ignore the plain terms of the law and deprive persons accused of crime of the rights and safeguards guaranteed by the Constitution. If our appellate courts had not the courage to hold these concienceless juridicial officers in check then the Chronicle would be justified in asserting that criminal justice is breaking down in California. The Le Doux woman is doubtless guilty and doubtless she would have been convicted if given a fair trial, but if the methods employed in her case were to be countenanced a guiltless woman similarly situated might find it impossible to prove her innocence. The verdict was set aside not to save Mrs. Le Doux but to protect innocence. When Sheriff O'Neil was pronounced disqualified in the Schmitz case because of his friendship for the defendant, the Chronicle did not think that criminal justice was breaking down in California. Why should the Chronicle be apprehensive because the Sheriff in Stockton who was allied with the prosecution has been similarly found wanting? The Chronicle says it is morally certain that the jury in the Le Doux case was absolutely impartial. The record shows that after the jurors voted to hang the defendant, a woman, while still in the jury room they cheered and woke the echoes a block away. Rather ardent and enthusiastic, however impartial, this good Stockton jury. The Chronicle, adopting the sentiments of many superficial critics, argues that a verdict should always be sustained whenever, after an examination of the facts, it appears that it is warranted by the evidence, regardless of the errors which may have been committeed. Let us apply this rule to the case at hand. Supposing the court should say: "We refuse to reverse because the verdict is sustained by the evidence." The prisoner would reply: "I am entitled to a trial by jury, by a fair jury, selected in the manner prescribed by law. You admit that I did not get this, yet you say because you believe I am guilty you will not give me a trial in accordance with law. Are you not passing on the facts? Are you not ursurping the province of the jury and declaring me guilty without authority of law?" The appellate court has no more authority than the trial court to pass upon the defendant's guilt. But when it decides that the defendant has been deprived of a jury trial (which in effect it does when it decides the jury was improperly selected) it has no right to deny a new trial on the ground that the court may believe the defendant guilty.

Light for the Average Citizen

Notwithstanding the triteness of the subject there is much exasperating provocation to painful rumination in recent developments touching the Graft Prosecution. When this enterprise, which was once deemed so laudable and inspiring, was in what might be termed its incipiency the conception which the average citizen formed of the designs, motives and methods of the men that promoted it was so vastly different from the amazing reality which has been gradually unfolded to his perceptions that it must now be somewhat painful to his vanity to reflect (if he ever engages in such mental exercise), on the deceptions and stratagems by which his sympathy and enthusiasm were enlisted. To remind him of all that was done to infect his infantile judgment with illusions and misconceptions would require more space than we can allot to the subject. Our only purpose at this time is to deal out a little wholesome admonition to the average citizen and urge upon his attention the moral lesson impressed by events. We feel that the average citizen should engage our solicitude. He is the unit of our civilization, and the business of the nation is conducted in accordance with his judgment. It is therefore important that he should be safeguarded against error. He is in need of guidance, for the conceit of ignorance is one of his characteristics and he is as lamentably susceptible to deception as he is hasty in forming his judgments. If he cannot be set right in every emergency at least he can profit from experience. Has there not been much profitable instruction for him in recent revelations touching the professions and practices of those civic patriots who, but recently enjoyed his unbounded confidence and ardent admiration? He knows now that those patriots were not entirely unselfish in discriminating in favor of the unspeakable Ruef. He knows that the incredible Heney was not really entitled to rank as a hero when it was popularly supposed that he was pauperizing himself on the altar of patriotism. Perhaps he has revised his opinion of the vociferous Dwyer and the astute Johnson since he has ascertained that it was not as gallant volunteers that they raged on the public rostrum and that it was not without pecuniary inspiration that they stood shoulder to shoulder with the protagonists of the thrilling civic drama. Whether the average citizen has yet been able to apprehend the significance of the strange proceedings to which Judge Lawlor has given countenance it is impossible at this time to determine. It is not improbable, however, that he has been impressed with the extraordinary and preposterous features of the Calhoun trial, but it may be too much to expect him to compare for ethical purposes the current debauchment with that which is supposed originally to have excited the indignation of our civic patriots. Of one thing we can be certain, however, and that is that the average citizen has been getting much profitable enlightenment.

How the Average Citizen Was Deluded

In consequence of the multitude of recent developments that serve to impress the average citizen with the importance of caution in forming his estimates of men and morals he has probably forgotten the representations that were made to him at the beginning for the purpose of enlisting his sympathy. It is of those representations that we wish particularly to remind him at this time. He was told that immunity was granted to corrupt officials because they were more sinned against than sinning. The boodlers were pictured in something like stained-glass attitudes, as poor, repentant, ignorant, harmless creatures who had been insidiously charmed, seduced and destroyed by the higher-up serpent of the public service corporations. The newspaper organs of the Holy Sanhedrim exploited this explanation and palliation of the dominant policy of the Uplifters and Regenerators with all the force and effect of which they were capable. Obviously they realized that ordinarily crooks in public office are not regarded as worthy objects of compassion and forbearance. Conscious of the repugnant heterodoxy of their policy they proselytized with cant and sophistry, they refuted with misrepresentation, they silenced with abuse and defamation. In this city was argued for the first time in the history of civilization, Pagan or Christian, the expediency and wisdom of condoning the knavery of the people's servants. For the first time in the history of government it was here urged that the morality of a political community might be promoted by spreading the mantle of charity over the crimes of crooks in office and employing traitors to a public trust as instruments of justice. For the conciliation of public sentiment the boodlers were held up as legitimate objects of commiseration and the higher-ups were systematically covered with obloquy. This insidious method of persuasion proved effective. The average citizen, who thinks by proxy, perceived nothing of a sinister nature in the attitude of the self-constituted guardians of the public weal. Indeed the average citizen, who has much envy in his soul and who is always susceptible to appeals to class hatred, espoused the cause of the Uplifters with much warmth. This same average citizen who, for nearly six years, was so busy with the pursuit of money, so careless of the morality of public life, that with shameful complaisance he viewed the spectacle of a city ruled by thieves and blackmailers; this eminently respectable person who well knew that Abe Ruef had been sandbagging the business interests with impunity and tapping every available source of revenue with impartial greed, was suddenly thrown into a spasm of morality, and in an outburst of smug Pharisaism he became an ardent partisan of the Patriots and vehemently denounced the directors of the public service corporations for corrupting the municipality. As scornful as the Patriots themselves of all that dissented from their views, he was a most disagreeable individual while the obsession was on. And even now though he has lost faith in the Uplifters, though he considers them unworthy of public confidence and esteem, it cannot be said for a certainty that he has revolted at their iniquities. It is more than likely that he has merely grown tired of their futilities; that he is bored to death. For if he was really the moralist that he appeared to be in his own eyes when he was raging against the higher-ups he would not be complaisant now toward the men by whom he was hoodwinked; he would be appalled at the crimes which they have committed, crimes by comparison with which those of Abe Ruef are but venial sins, and he would be clamoring for their punishment.

The Prostitution of the Courts

Of course the average citizen may not have derived all the potential profit of his experience. Vaguely conscious of the fact that the Patriots have failed because they were dishonest, it is hardly likely that he appreciates the enormities of their practices in the courts. He is cognizant of the iniquity of corrupting supervisors, but the prostitution of courts is a species of turpitude to which perhaps he has not given much thought. How the machinery of justice has been manipulated is a matter which cannot be apprehended without some technical knowledge, and of this the average citizen is destitute. To what baseness juridical officers have decended in their passionate efforts to coddle the mob and serve their masters it is not for him to know. But he can be rendered sensible of the misrepresentation and fraud by which he was deluded. Once more therefore we remind him that his pity for the weak, susceptible Supervisors was evoked by vivid pictures of the temptation artfully plied by the higher-ups of the public service corporations. Once more we remind him that the higher-ups were execrated because they seduced the innocent ones. At the same time we call his attention to the sworn, undisputed record of the history of the boodlers' career, from which it appears that hardly had they taken their oath of office before they banded themselves together to hold up citizens in all walks of life. There is testimony on record by the yard showing that the boodlers organized a system of blackmail. There is testimony enough to sink a ship showing that the first bribes the boodlers extorted were from the prize-fight trust; and almost everybody who is not a member of the immaculate League of Justice or the divine Church Federation knows that the members of the prize-fight trust are now under the protection of some of the leading patriots of the Graft Prosecution. Incidentally it should be stated that the damning record also shows that before the immunity bargain was closed the boodlers extorted from the patriots the promise that no effort would be made to compel any crook to disgorge his plunder. Who can ponder the whole miserable story without realizing that the morals of the community have been impaired rather than strengthened?

Unregenerate Stockton

By Arthur Swan

In the hope of obtaining information with which to enlighten the readers of Town Talk with respect to the somewhat startling manifestation of political reaction in Stockton, I visited the city last week and interrogated some of the leading citizens. For the benefit of those busy individuals who do not keep in touch with political affairs and sociological phenomena I will explain that the city of Stockton has gone wet; furthermore that at a recent election in Stockton the good people of that town voted in favor of ignoring the pious advice and wholesome counsel of the gentlemen of the pulpit and returning to the evil ways of the unregenerate. It should also be explained that the community has had experience of goodness for a whole year and has had ample opportunity of realizing the superior advantages of a moral atmosphere. The reaction in Stockton has therefore caused much uneasiness among reformers and civic patriots from San Diego to Siskiyou which is more than twice the distance from Dan to Beersheeba. Regenerators in all parts of the State have been put on the anxious seat by the apparent revolt of a virtuous community against wholesome asceticism. They are wondering whether the defeat of the good and the pure in Stockton is significant of a reaction against vociferous puritanism. They are asking whether the sentiment of the State is reflected in the triumph of the unregenerate of the Slough City; whether the people have become tired of muckraking and sceptical of the professions of the blatantly self-righteous.

Apparently the only thing we can be certain of at this time is that Stockton has rebuked her long-haired patriots, her noblest citizens and benefactors, gentlemen who had consecrated themselves with enthusiasm and with eyes uplifted to the moral exaltation of the community. Why Stockton should have thus requited the beneficent activities of her patriots I have endeavored to ascertain. After much interviewing I came to the conclusion that many elements operated on the public mind of Stockton. Conditions there were somewhat similar to those that prevailed in the colony of Pennsylvania when William Penn returned to England, causing him to write to the leading citizens of the settlement urging them to be a little less "governmentish." Stockton doesn't object to being as good as her neighbors, but she wants a little more individual liberty than the average reformer conceives to be wholesome. Under restraint she has been eager to hark back to the good old roystering days of Dr. Harkness, Alexander Loutitt, Orrin Henderson and Irving Martin who managed the political machine on the familiar principle on which political machines have been managed from time immemorial.

The recent political history of Stockton is instructive if not edifying. A little over a year ago control of the political machine was secured by August Meunter, who is now Collector of Internal Revenue, Editor Phelps of the Independent, and Arthur Ashley, a lawyer. It was understood that they were friendly to the saloon element. They elected George McNoble district attorney. At that time McNoble was regarded as one of the boys, and he enjoyed the confidence of the saloon element. But about the time of his election he experienced a change of sentiment. With his ear to the ground he was carried along by the wave of reform that was sweeping over the country. He enlisted in the army of political purity and dedicated his talents to the purging of his native village. He became one of the most ardent of self-righteous purists. And like all the reformers of the period he saw nothing but corruption on all sides of him. The country, in his opinion, was going to the demnition bowwows; the crooks were rampant and the jails ought to be filled with them. George McNoble became the pet of the pulpit, the joy and inspiration of the long-haired fraternity. With the backing and encouragement of R. E. Wilhoit, J. H. Huff and Andrew Simpson, the gallant district attorney started a crusade against the forces of iniquity. A propaganda for purity and puritanism was organized, and the people of Stockton were exhorted to mend their morals and take a stand against Satan. An election was held, and the town went dry on Sundays. You couldn't get a glass of beer even with your meals in Stockton on the Sabbath. Then the good McNoble started a crusade against the oldest profession on earth. He resolved to wipe out the tenderloin and exterminate the "priestesses of civilization."

A Good Government League was organized in Stockton, and like most good government leagues it promised to rectify all abuses. To this end a committee called a Custody Committee was formed for the purpose of doing secret politics all for the greater glory of Stockton. George Buck, an attorney of the Southern Pacific Company was the most zealous member of this good government league. He was associated with another militant reformer in the person of W. R. Jacobs, a lawyer, formerly of Tulare, who made money sending tramps to jail when there was a bounty on tramps. In Stockton Jacobs was vociferously virtuous.

Like the reformers of San Francisco and the reformers of Oakland the reformers of Stockton fairly bristled with reproaches. They were scornful of all men whose ideals were not in the clouds. And to persuade the dear people that the town was in need of reformation they went raking for muck in the muncipal government. They found that a policeman had accepted ten dollars from a dive keeper as a Christmas present; also, that a councilman who had organized a paint company had sold stock to his friends among whom were Henry Adams of the Gas Company, C. D. Clark of the Navigation Company and Carl Brueck of the Clark & Henry Contracting Company. Obviously this was an awful state of affairs. Charges were filed, and as Lincoln Steffens was too far away the redoubtable Chester Rowell was imported from Fresno to inveigh against corruption and preach the importance of redemption. During the campaign the policeman who accepted the Christmas present was held up as an awful example and the councilman who had indiscreetly financed his paint company was pilloried and anathematized. Great was the noise made by the zealous reformers, but the incorrigible community turned them down on election day and actually elected a ticket that had been nominated by Colonel Nunan of the Mail and a few of his friends who are said to be not a whit better than they ought to be. It's a sad story. The reformers are disconsolate. McNoble is in great pain.

The Kleptomaniac

From the French of A. Boissiere

When Madame de Tramond, standing before her mirror, began putting on her rings, a look of envy came into the eyes of her friend Madame Asbly.

"Just my luck," exclaimed Madame de Tramond as she removed one of the rings from which a pearl set in a sphinx's head had became detached. As she was about to put both ring and pearl back into her jewel box Madame Asbly reached for it, and after a casual examination, remarked that the gold had become worn, and replaced it on the table.

Madame de Tramond being in a hurry locked the case with its little gold key and tossed it carelessly into the drawer. "I'm ready Valentine," she announced, and they were off to a concert given by little Madame de Rosemay, a friend of both and a former schoolmate.

As Madame de Tramond was going the next day to the country, where her husband was shooting with Monsieur de Rosemay, she said to herself: "I shall have the ring mended, on my return."

De Rosemay's automobile took them into the country, where their husbands came to meet them. That evening Madame de Tramond confided to her husband: "Francine de Rosemay has a most vile tongue. She talked of nothing but the Asblys, especially Valentine. No, I cannot understand it. It is not possible!"

Her husband frowned as he replied: "Where there is smoke there is likely to be fire. I have heard some gossip in the club."

"What, you believe it, too?" she asked.

"Hm," said de Tramond, "they say it cost Asbly four thousand francs to square himself, all for a few imitation laces that surely were not worth more than twenty-five francs."

Madame de Tramond gave no credence to the tattle of Madame de Rosemay nor to her husband's gossip. It was nonsense. Anyway she did not believe in kleptomania, at least not as a fashionable foble.

On Tuesday, they returned to town to attend a first-night performance at the Vaudeville.

Thinking she would take her ring to the jeweler's, she opened the bureau drawer, then the jewel-case. The ring with the sphinx's head was there, but the pearl was missing! She was startled, and suddenly a mist obscured her vision.

Her maid she certainly could not suspect for she was sure she had locked the case and drawer and taken the keys with her. Then she suddenly remembered and saddened at the thought. She saw Madame Asbly as she was the day of the accident of the ring; she saw her old schoolmate, who was very dear to her in spite of all this malicious gossip.

She remembered Valentine had taken the jewel case from her, saying: "The gold has become worn."

Madame de Tramond was almost in tears, not at losing the pearl but at losing, apparently irrevocably, her life-long friend. She could not bear it. She tried to reason with herself. What should she do? The ring was her joy, a perfect work of art; moreover it had been a present from her husband. The sphinx, yes the sphinx! Here was an enigma, and she feared that the solution was only too simple. Then she had an inspiration, just as the maid announced Madame Asbly.

But first they must kiss and ask and answer questions about the journey in the automobile of that little viper Madame de Rosemay.

"It is a go then, our first night at the Vaudeville?" inquired Madame Asbly. "Certainly, and by the bye, Valentine," said Madame de Tramond in her most ingenuous manner, "we are leaving town for a day and you will oblige me greatly if you will leave my ring at the jeweler's. You know the ring that I found broken the other day, when you were calling. Try and bring it to me Thursday, will you, dear?"

Without waiting for a reply, she put the jewel-case into Madame Asbly's hands, locked as it was and handed her the key as well.

Madame Asbly's manner was cool, unimpeachable. No strange light shone in her eyes, and yet there was a moment of awkward silence on the part of the two friends between the time of the asking of this slight service and its acceptance.

And then Valentine calmly accepted, adding, in a most casual and indifferent tone: "Yes, I know, the pearl with the sphinx's head."

As had been agreed, the Asblys and the Tramonds were to go together to the first night at the Vaudeville. Madame de Tramond was putting the finishing touches to her toilet, standing before her mirror when her friend Valentine entered. In her eyes was no look of envy and in her features no guilty blushes appeared. Her gaze was serenity itself, and her manner showed perfect self-possession.

She held the little jewel-case in her hand and as she handed it to her friend, her hand was without a tremor. But Madame de Tramond's hand trembled although almost imperceptibly.

The two women seemed to be playing the last act of a comedy, but a comedy of real life where many a weakness finds its excuse and many a sorrow its recompense.

Madame de Tramond unlocked the jewel-case with the golden key, opened it and saw the ring intact with the pearl that the jeweler had reset.

She was greatly pleased and blushed slightly. "You know I think everything of it; it's a present from my husband," she remarked casually.

For some moments the two friends gazed at each other silently, with a look that seemed to eliminate all weakness, all pity. Between them there was no sign of reproach, no acknowledgement of guilt. The sphinx remained unanswered.

Quickly putting an end to this painful scene, they threw themselves into each other's arms, and without apparent motive the tears came to their eyes.

Not long ago, one evening at the club after a successful game of bridge, Rosemay took Tramond to one side.

"Do you know," said he, "Asbly is perfectly happy. He told me in confidence, a great secret." And then lowering his voice, "Madame Asbly is completely cured of her mania. Between you and me, that scandal about the department store and the imitation laces gave her the finishing lesson."

And that evening, on Monsieur de Tramond's repeating this conversation to his wife, she merely smiled, enigmatically as another sphinx, and remained silent.

Some of Our Ancestors

Being Somewhat in the Nature of a Fantastic Resume of the Possible and Probable Risk We Incur When We Run Back on the Long Trail of Our Uncertain and Diversified Pedigrees.

By Democritus

In a cafe the other night, under the influence of the lights, the music and the laughter-laden atmosphere, I fell a-musing upon the folk about me. I tried to imagine these merry devotees at the shrine of Pleasure suddenly transformed into the shape and habit of their ancestors. I wondered what that baldheaded little man at the next table would think of himself if he were thrust back into the time when he was a gladiator of Gaul doing his turn in the arena of Vespasian. Would he feel like getting up from his lobster a la Newburgh and slaughtering a few of his neighbors to make a Roman holiday? Or would he recall himself in time to check his sanguinary impulse, remembering that he was not a gladiator, and that the police were within hailing distance?—not the praetorian guards whom he had known in his ancestral days, but modern conservators of the public peace whose duty it would be to put him in jail for yielding to his ancestral impulses? Then I imagined him in the hands of this modern police, having smashed the man at the next table with his fist while laboring under the hallucination that he was wielding a short Roman sword in combat with a big Thracian armed with a net and trident. He would, of course, recognize his captors as Picts and Celts and savage Britons, clothed in skins and rushing to battle with the Roman legions shouting uncouth war cries that afterwards softened to the Gaelic brogue that made melodious accompaniment to the sweet strains of the harp that once through Tara's halls its soul of music shed.

And the dark-eyed lady on the other side of the table with whom this little baldheaded gentleman, descended from the gladiators, conversed so familiarly and with such evident relish of her company?—what would she think of herself in such companionship could she but realize that if a princess of the house of Rameses had not mated with a king of the Hittites after the battle of Kadesh, she would not be sitting there in that twentieth century cafe entertaining a baldheaded little man whose ancestors were professional assassins forced to kill rival assassins in the Roman arena more than a thousand years after Sesostris had been comfortably mummied for protracted sepulture in the royal tombs of Deir-el-Bahari? Wouldn't the realization of her ignoble association give the dark-eyed lady something resembling a jolt?

Yet in their modern environment there was nothing incongruous in this juxtaposition and familiar contiguity of a descendant of the pharaohs with a baldheaded little gentleman whose ancestors were common cutthroats of the Roman circus. Time is a great leveller. The royal strain of Egypt had to peter out in the flow of the centuries, and the gladiatorial instinct could not persist in its original ferocity under the changed conditions of a more civilized age which permits its gladiators to appear at intervals only in the prize ring. Consequently it was perfectly in accord with the fitness of things that the little, baldheaded floorwalker should treat the prettiest girl in the lace department to a Newburgh lobster after the theatre in one of the fashionable cafes of the town.

At another table I observed a large gentleman of very distinguished aspect attired in evening clothes and fine linen whom I knew to be a "well-known banker" of great wealth, and pardonably proud of his "family" the progenitors of which "came over with William the Norman" while their descendants "came over in the Mayflower" or with Lord Baltimore and other aristocratic personages that constitute the real thing in the way of ancestors for our very best and most exclusive society. The wife of this imposing citizen sat opposite to him—a portly dame with streaks of gray in her hair and a kindly smile on her countenance indicating a gentle, lovable disposition.. I knew that this lady was also pardonably proud of her immediate ancestry—that she was not only a "Daughter of the Revolution," but that she could trace her lineage back to Cromwell and even farther, always finding persons in her family that were worth knowing and worth cultivating after you had become acquainted with them.

But I was not content to let this pride of ancestry rest in such smug respectability, and I wondered what the banker and his wife would think of themselves if they could know as I knew that back of that Norman ancestry and that Cromwellian progenity (what a pity that this excellent word has been allowed to drop into obsolescence) was a ruck of the most disreputable ancestors that ever slumped around in the dark backward and abysm of time, creating anarchy and chaos in a barbarous age just beginning to be illumined by the first glimmer of the dawn of history.

I could not but confess to myself, however, that these respectable persons were better fitted for companionship than were the floorwalker and the shopgirl. Their lineages had been consistently adapted to each other since the ancestor of the most distant of the banker's acknowledged progenitors was a Babylonian slave cowering under the ruthless lash of the Mesopotamian taskmaster; and since the ancestors of the banker's wife were chattels sold for the meanest drudgery of the common households of Nineveh, Tyre and old Damascus. I traced their "family line" along through the ages and I found them always delving and toiling for the conqueror and the oppressor, until I came to the mediaeval period where they were peasant vassals of robber barons or robber hordes of self-emancipated peasantry. Some of them were pirates in the North Sea and along the coasts of Spain and Algiers; some of them were of the free companies that ravaged France before Louis XI began to hang them on sight. In the meantime some of them had gone over with William to assist in burnishing the arms of the Conquerors and grooming the horses of the invaders. It is true that these ancestors "came over with the Conqueror," and it is true also that they came over in a menial capacity. But that circumstance has long since been forgotten, and tonight if you sit at their table in the brilliant cafe, while the lights are a-glitter and the music is crashing through an Offenbach opera, they will tell you on inquiry, that Robert of Normandy knighted several of these ancestors long before his son William crossed the channel, and that after the battle of Hastings they were created Earls and Dukes for their valor and wisdom; but that the titles have all gone to the collateral branches of the family now resident in England or living in obscure lodgings in Paris having abandoned their pretensions to nobility. All of which may or may not be true to the historical fact, but is of no material consequence except as a reminiscence of personal vanity in the possession of something that anyone may claim but which

The Spreckels Family Feud

It is predicted that when the Spreckels will contest gets into court there will quickly follow some very highly seasoned developments. John D. Spreckels, his friends say, is in a fighting mood and there is not the slightest likelihood of a compromise. Most humiliating to the proud Spreckels' spirit was the treatment which John D. received during the last few years of his father's life, when Rudolph, reinstated in the affection of the old man assumed sway over the latter's business affairs and completely sidetracked the eldest son. In the days of Rudolph's ascendancy he appeared to have the old man under something in the nature of a hypnotic spell, and the faithful John D. who had stuck to him through the gloomy and embittered days of the family feud which Rudolph inflamed by conduct that seemed to have been designed to exasperate his father, was virtually cast aside. While apparently John D. Spreckels acquiesced in all that was done his intimate friends knew that the fires of rage and indignation were consuming his vitals. And in the opinion of these friends it is not surprising that he should now be convinced that when Claus Spreckels made his will he was not in his right mind.

The Origin of the Feud

It will be very interesting to learn how Rudolph Spreckels succeeded in ingratiating himself into the affection of the father that he had harassed and tormented. It was no easy matter to conciliate or placate old Claus Spreckels. For many years his attitude toward his own daughter showed that he was a man of a most relentless and unforgiving nature. Toward all persons that had ever given him offense he was extremely vindictive, and never perhaps in his whole career was the vindictiveness of Claus Spreckels so persistently and remorselessly excited as by his sons Gus and Rudolph. What the origin of the trouble between them was we shall never authoritatively know until the contest is in full swing. Various are the versions that have been given of the cause of the feud. The one most generally credited is to the effect that at the time of Claus Spreckels's fight against the Sugar Trust he called on his sons, to whom he had given large sums of money, to contribute some of the sinews of war and that Gus turned him down. It is said that subsequently Rudolph joined forces with his brother in a feud that was more or less embittered by differences between the families of the married sons. Publicity was first given to the quarrel in the early nineties when Gus Spreckels and H. M. Wooley brought suit against Claus, John D. and Adolph B. Spreckels and other directors of the Hawaiian Sugar Company to recover large sums of money out of which, the plaintiffs alleged, they had been defrauded. A sensational trial was expected but after some hot skirmishing during which Claus Spreckels was treated with considerable harshness, a secret agreement of compromise was entered into. The terms were kept secret until some years later Rudolph Spreckels brought suit to prevent the transfer of stock given by him as collateral security to the Nevada Bank for his brother Gus. It then appeared that the old gentlemen had made a complete settlement.

The Reconciliation

The quarrel between Claus Spreckels and his only daughter was the result of her marriage with Tom Watson. Because she married without his consent he flew into a great passion, and there followed some very bitter litigation over property which the old man had deeded to his daughter. Rudolph Spreckels was the first of the estranged children to win back the affection of his father, and gradually he paved the way to a reconciliation with his sister and his brother. But there was never a complete family reunion. Between John D. and Adolph Spreckels on the one hand, and Rudolph and Gus on the other, the family feud raged down to the day of their father's death and the hostile brothers are now farther apart than ever. Claus Spreckels went to his grave knowing that his children were irreconcilable and leaving a will which he must have known, if in sound mental condition, would serve to intensify the hatreds which he was instrumental in breeding.

An Episode of the Feud

Rudolph Spreckels will be represented in the contest by the ever-faithful Charles Wheeler, who recently spoke at the Bar Association on "The Ideals of the Profession." Wheeler was Rudolph Spreckels's attorney in the old days when Claus Spreckels was pursued relentlessly by his sons. Mr. Wheeler and his client are very intimate friends. Mr. Wheeler is an ardent admirer of his client and espouses his interests with a profound sentimental loyalty as was demonstrated some years ago when the war was on by an episode in the offices of Mr. Samuel M. Shortridge, who was the attorney, and who has always been the loyal supporter of John D. Spreckels. Mr. Wheeler in company with Ramon Wilson called on Mr. Shortridge, and demanded to know whether he was responsible for an article which had appeared in one of the daily papers and by which discredit was reflected on Mr. Rudolph Spreckels. Mr. Shortridge disclaimed responsibility but endorsed the sentiments expressed in the article. Thereupon Mr. Wheeler announced his intention of resenting Mr. Shortridge's attitude and demanded to know whether Mr. Shortridge was prepared for a physical encounter. Mr. Shortridge was not, but would be later on. He fixed the hour at which he would be ready and designated his office as the place of meeting. Promptly at the hour fixed Mr. Wheeler and Mr. Wilson returned and they were met by Mr. John D. and Mr. Adolph Spreckels who explained that they were on hand to attend to any little business that Mr. Wheeler or Mr. Wilson might have with their attorney. The scene that followed was of an animated character but no blows were struck.

Poetess (suggestively)—I assure you that I prefer to be alone with my thoughts.

He—Without a chaperon? You ought to be ashamed of yourself!

Meredith and Henry H. Rogers

Did you observe, gentle reader, with what scant courtesy the local newspapers chronicled the death of George Meredith? And did you mark, a day or so later, with what fulsome particularity they hung over the bier of Henry H. Rogers? Poor Meredith got a few lines that barely told who he was and what he had written; there was no effort at appreciation; no smallest sign of critical knowledge of his achievement. Rogers, on the other hand, received the obsequious treatment due to a Standard Oil baron who had accumulated more money than all the pirates ever cached along the shores of the Spanish Main. The public has always been given to understand that newspaper space is measured out by rules of almost scientific exactitude, based upon close study of the demands of the vulgar multitude. If that is the case, it would seem to follow that to the great American public Henry H. Rogers is of as much greater importance than George Meredith as two goodly columns exceed half a printer's stick. That is to say that the death of Meredith would shrink into insignificance beside the passing of a nigger preacher.

A Question of Values

Here is an indictment of the American newspaper-reading public, seemingly sound as to logic, to which I am loath unreservedly to subscribe. For one reason, I hate to see my beloved countrymen exposed to the taunt of worshiping riches and doing honor to the hoarder of earthly dross while neglecting the memory of one who piled up for posterity imperishable treasures. And so I am tempted to ask if there may not be a mysterious fitness in the comparative length of the newspaper obituaries of Rogers and Meredith. May it not be that a couple of columns of newspaper space adequately measures the value of Henry H. Rogers' sojourn on earth and having paid full tribute, the public, as represented by the newspapers, is henceforth and forever released from fealty to his memory? Is it not more than possible that Rogers' sole claim to fame will be his long and intimate friendship with Mark Twain? and is it too fanciful to suppose that his memory will go down the ages in that wonderful autobiography which our greatest humorist is writing, when his gold pieces have been squandered and his combinations in restraint of trade have been dissolved and forgotten?

An English Parallel

So I am not going to roast the American newspapers over the leaping flames of my perfervid literary indignation. Far from it. As a matter of fact, I am ready with a sop to American vanity, if that particular weakness of my esteemed countrymen has been in any wise touched by the foregoing remarks. Nothing so tickles hurt vanity as the proof that our neighbors are no better than we. Well, England seems to be nearly as bad as the United States in the matter of appreciating genius. At the present time the leading literary men of the tight little island are lambasting their smug countrymen for regarding with indifference the disappearance and probable suicide of John Davidson. Among others William Watson, the unlaurelled master of English poesy, has been expressing his indignation over the fact that the British newspapers have shown niggardly concern for the fate of Davidson, great poet though he was, and have shrieked through many columns over the sudden and spectacular taking off, via a motor car and a precipice, of

A CHARACTERISTIC PARISIAN DUEL IN THE "PARC DES PRINCES"

Miss Violet Charlesworth, eminently successful during her lifetime in the role of a bewitching swindler. That the British public should evince more interest in the death of a pretty cheat than in the evanishment of a poet argues more than vulgar taste; it shows absolute lack of imagination.

"Why won't you marry Matilda?"

"Because she's a woman with a past."

"Why, I never heard anything against her. What's your objection to her past?"

"There's too much of it."

Davidson's Strange Disappearance

The careers of pretty swindlers have been so often exploited that they must be bizarre indeed to yield anything but the commonplace; whereas it is only once in a century or so that a singer of perfect music, like John Davidson, disappears suddenly and is apparently swallowed in ether. When such things happened in the golden age, men made stories about them; thus was Ganymede ravished from earth and that other who galloped into the heavens on the back of Pegasus. Davidson disappeared from his home in Penzance, leaving behind papers which made it clear that he feared cancer and intended to destroy himself. His will was published later and a queer document it was, closing with these ominous words: "I hope to live to finish my testaments and tragedies, but I may have to die before, and at any moment now, for reasons which concern myself alone." The will also gave instructions that no words, except of his own writing, should appear in any book of his as long as the copyright endured; that no one should write his biography (Thackeray made the same request, but it has not been respected); and that certain plays and adaptations of his should never again be published or performed. He even begged those who possessed copies to destroy them. For the few local students of Davidson's works it may be interesting to note that among the plays he wished destroyed were: "Queen Fiammetta," "The Children of the King," "Fancy Legrand," "Phedre," "Lancelot" and "The Game of Life." Davidson, living, was caviare to the general; he did his appointed work, as William Watson puts it, "in obscurity and cruel neglect, to die at last of the accumulated fury of a lifetime." That the unusual circumstances of his death should not have lent him, for the British public, a factitious interest transcending that attaching to Miss Violet Charlesworth, the swindler, is remarkable. But it helps to excuse Americans for paying more attention to the death of Henry H. Rogers than to that of George Meredith. Never mind. One of these days it will become the fad to admire "The Ballad of a Nun" and "The Egoist."

"Tommy," said a father to his precocious five-year-old son and heir, "your mother tells me she gives you pennies to be good. Do you think that is right?"

"Of course it is," replied Tommy; "you certainly don't want me to grow up and be good for nothing, do you?"

What's In a Name?

Ever and anon the modern Juliet asks condescendingly from her balcony: What's in a name? "Alas!" I answer, "nothing in mine in the bank! Who forger-wise (or foolish) filches me of it robs me of that which naught enriches him. Veritable trash he steals who steals my purse!" But I am talking to thin air. Juliet hath twenty-three'd. There is more in other names than in mine. In the name a woman is willing to change hers for nowadays is much. Else I am much mistaken; else is she. Some men are born rich in name, some nominally rich, and there is nothing women love better than to have rich names thrust upon them,—one at a time, of course, as the law requires. In these days of divorce, for most women a change of name seems to be a very natural change indeed, if not a change of nature. Judging from the records, they'd as lief change their names as would I a twenty; though there be who say that by the time a woman has had ten names she has none; the which sounds like a paradox in my unsophisticated ears. Had it not been answered once and for all time, this scribe himself had asked: "In Kingdom Come, whose wife, pray?" There, however, as we are fully assured, they neither marry nor are given in marriage nor to it. How otherwise were Heaven Heaven? I write not in envy of highly honored signatures, nor do I covet any of my rich neighbor's many one-at-a-time wives; I write in this vein simply because my name is my weak spot. Like Achilles, I am not well heeled. Let me make my meaning clearer by means of a rough draft, a pen-and-ink sketch entitled "A Drawing Card":

A Drawing Card

John Drew

A goodly artist once I saw
  Art's sake, but he could go a few!
Myself, I'd give a dime to draw
  The kind of corks John Drew.

Such drawing presupposes pelf;
  But it, believe me, I could do
If I could only draw myself
  The sort of checks John Drew.

And that would nothing be to speak
  About—that is, 'twixt me and you—
If I could only draw each week
  The salary John Drew.

And, hard as cash is, that I might,
  No doubt, accomplish, too,
If I could only draw each night
  The houses Johnny Drew.

Of houses I could have my fill,
  Each day one nice and new,
If I could only draw at will
  The lifelike things John Drew.

And what—I'd like to know—on earth
  Had easier been—pooh-pooh!—
If I had only drawn at birth
  The ticket Johnny Drew.

But, friends, to what would this amount,
  Kept up till Doomsday dawn?
John Drew, just like my bank account,
  E'en now is overdrawn.

Safeguarding the Jury

Judge Lawlor is a stern stickler for the judicial, legal and personal proprieties. Especially punctilious is he that nothing shall happen in the court where he presides that shall influence the jury, aside from the letter of the codes and statutes; he has been known to rebuke attorneys at the bar of the court for transgressing the rules of procedure in the examination of witnesses, and he is constantly warning the juries that sit with him in the adjudication of cases, that they are to pay no heed to the wrangles of the lawyers or the exchanges of diverse opinion between the court and the attorneys. He strives to safeguard the jury from every disturbing outside influence and he is peculiarly sensitive to every trick of the lawyers' trade invented to confuse or upset the state of the jurors. It was once the habit of unscrupulous persons intimately acquainted with one or more of the jurors sitting under the watchful eye of Judge Lawlor to come into court and shake hands with those of counsel for the side of the controversy that they desired should receive the verdict of the jury. These persons became so pestiferously effusive in their ostentatious friendship with attorneys engaged in the trial of cases before Judge Lawlor, that at last the patience of the court became exhausted and he announced from the bench in open court that if these persons didn't stop trying to influence the jury by these didoes he would send them to jail for contempt. It is seldom now that anyone tries this game on the court, and when he does it is in utter ignorance of the risk he runs. Judge Dunne is probably one of the ignorant, for on two occasions he has come into the Superior Court where Judge Lawlor is sitting in judgment on the Calhoun case, and ostentatiously grasped the hand of Special Prosecutor Heney, thus proclaiming the Assistant District Attorney an intimate and much beloved acquaintance; a man in whom he has the utmost confidence and one whom he is proud to meet. With a few words of congratulation or whatever his whispered conference may be, he goes still smiling to the bench where Judge Lawlor sits, and there surveys the jury with a critical eye as a connoisseur might inspect a rare work of art or as a naturalist might look upon strange animals in a corral.

Do you know what Quality means in a Turkish Cigarette? If not get a box of "MILO." Then, any other cigarette, and try same, side by side. You'll note the delicate, aromatic mildness of the "MILO." Mildness (yet with the richness in flavor) is what costs in Turkish Tobacco, and its just this that makes the Perfect Cigarette. You'll find it in No Other.

Defying the Rule of Court

Judge Dunne unquestionably has a right to greet his friend Heney in court or out of it; and there is not the slightest suspicion that he times this friendly greeting for the edification of the jury in the Calhoun case. It is not at all likely that he even knows any of the jurors or that any of them cares a rap for his friendship for Special Prosecutor Heney or would be influenced in his verdict by the fact thus publicly proclaimed that he and the Assistant District Attorney are on handshaking terms. But such flagrant violation of one of the most imperative rules of the court over which he presides must make Judge Lawlor squirm inside of him although outwardly he is himself on the friendliest terms with his fellow jurist. Still, notwithstanding the known integrity of Judge Dunne and his absolute ignorance of any influence he may exert on any member of the Calhoun jury by manifesting his intense affection for Special Prosecutor Heney, Judge Lawlor ought to apprise him of the rule in that court prohibiting social intercourse between counsel and their friends while a trial is in progress.

The Dwyer Fee

The most unsatisfactory and deplorable of the disclosures which the Hon. Rudolph Spreckels was forced to make upon the witness stand was embodied in the item with reference to that indefatigable patriot, the Hon. Joseph J. Dwyer. From this item it appears that Mr. Dwyer was paid $13,400, that amount having been agreed upon by arbitrators as compensation sufficient for the services rendered by Mr. Dwyer to the Graft Prosecution. This item is unsatisfactory because of the light that it does not shed. It is less eloquent than silence, it is more bewildering than words. The disclosure is deplorable because it dissipates the halo which has garnished with radiance the Dwyer mazard. However exalted his ideals, however virtuous his intentions, the civic patriot unlike the patriot of the battlefield cannot win glory while putting money in his purse. Mr. Dwyer, it appears, is more of a hired advocate than a disinterested patriot. It must be sufficient for Mr. Dwyer to know that for whatever he has done in the interest of the dear people he has been well paid. I assume that he has been well paid and yet I am by no means certain, since I have but little knowledge respecting Mr. Dwyer's services. I have heard that he wrote some of that populistic petition for a new trial in the Schmitz case, but that surely wasn't worth much. There are law clerks who would do more and better for $100. Mr. Dwyer was present in court when Ruef confessed and with tears in his eyes felicitated the unspeakable one. That was worth something. There are lawyers who wouldn't do as much for ten times the whole fee that was paid to Mr. Dwyer. I am of the opinion that Mr. Dwyer did not charge for his felicitations. And yet I am certain that Mr. Dwyer earned the money. The arbitrators have said that he did, and besides it is known that Mr. Dwyer is a most conscientious man. But it would be interesting to know what Mr. Dwyer did for the money. Of course there were many things that might have been done by a man so happily situated as he was. Mr. Dwyer was the political manager of District Attorney Langdon and when that noble patriot balked at the proposition to appoint Mr. Heney, the persuasive Dwyer argued the desirability of the appointment. That was worth something, for Mr. Langdon was so stubborn that the civic patriots went out and talked about him. They had dreadful suspicions touching Mr. Langdon at that time. Mr. Dwyer was also the intimate friend of B. P. Oliver, the foreman of a celebrated grand jury the memory of which will go ringing down the grooves of time. Mr. Dwyer also occupied the perfectly legitimate position of attorney for the elisor of the Schmitz jury. So altogether he was in a very happy position.

The Cobb Fee

The testimony with reference to the fee paid to young Mr. Cobb of San Jose is even more confusing than that with reference to the Dwyer fee. Cobb it appears is to get about twenty-five thousand dollars for his services. His fee is said to have been calculated on the basis of his earnings as a lawyer in San Jose. Until Mr. Spreckels gave his testimony it was never supposed that there was any lawyer in San Jose who earned more than four thousand dollars a year. It was surprising to learn of the lucrativeness of Cobb's practice because not long before he became Mr. Heney's partner he was quite willing to give up his practice and become a superior judge. The confusing thing about the testimony with reference to the Cobb fee is that the young attorney labored under the delusion for nearly a year that Heney was to get half of it. Now if that was his understanding of the matter there must have been some error in the estimate that was made of what he was entitled to on the basis of his earnings; half of twenty-five thousand, or whatever the total amount is, is what Mr. Cobb calculated that he was entitled to and therefore he cannot conscientiously retain the whole fee. Of course under the law the presumption is that partners have a mutual interest in each other's earnings, but our civic patriots wish it to be understood that the presumption doesn't apply in this instance. However, if Mr. Heney had died, his heirs would probably have had no difficulty in getting half that fee. Indeed Cobb would have yielded half in accordance with his understanding of the matter.

The Examiner Building

Work on the Hearst skyscraper at Third and Market streets is to be started this summer. Plans have been drawn for a building of twenty-three stories, but Mr. Hearst will content himself for the present with a building of considerably less height than the one originally designed. It is said that the work will be rushed and that the mechanical, editorial and business departments of the Examiner will be housed in the new building before the end of the coming winter. I hear that Mr. Hearst intends to spend more of his time hereafter on this edge of the continent. He recently added considerable territory to his holdings on the Marin Shore and he intends to establish a beautiful country residence there. A short time ago he purchased in New York some powerful engines for a gasoline launch which is to be built in this city for the use of himself and family.

Gridge—That will be a fine marriage, a splendid alliance. The bride's father is rich. She rolls in gold. The bridegroom is rich, too, he made a fortune in copper.

Bridge—That's not an alliance, it's an alloy.

The Political Situation

The politicians of the Republican machine are very busy these days trying to find a suitable candidate for the mayoralty. The rumor has been out that Tim Sullivan's candidate, the willing Mr. Crocker, capitalist and genial fellow, has a cinch on the nomination. According to rumor Mr. Crocker was agreed upon before Mr. W. F. Herrin started for the East. Rumor credits Mr. Crocker with having enlisted the support of a very powerful element of the community. He is said to be satisfactory to all hands and the captain. He is reported to have captured the Good Government League. Nevertheless I am not persuaded that the fate of Mr. Crocker has been settled in the manner most agreeable to himself. The fact is, as I have said, that the politicians of the Republican machine are on a still hunt for a candidate. They have been trying to find a man in whom the non-political and business elements of the city will have absolute confidence. I have heard that they are so eager to put the municipal government in good hands that they will not object to a capable, upright citizen on the score of partisanship. Color has been given to this report by the circumstance that many prominent and influential Republicans have urged William F. Humphrey, president of the Olympic Club to run for Mayor. Though Mr. Humphrey is a Democrat he has been virtually offered the nomination on the Republican ticket on the theory that the Democrats could not afford to deny him the nomination. But Mr. Humphrey has a large law practice and he is not inclined to plunge into politics. Besides he is pretty busy at present pulling the Olympic Club out of the hole that Harrison built. Meanwhile the Democratic machine politicians are evincing no disposition to do non-partisan politics in the interest of the dear pee-pul. The Hickey faction, which is concerned principally with the Public Administrator's office and which takes orders from the Bulletin, will accept any old candidate for the mayoralty on condition that O'Gara be given the nomination for district attorney. The G. P. must be kept in control of the works at all hazards and the devil may help himself to the rest.

A Reformer Repudiated

District Attorney Langdon is believed to be out of politics but his brothers of the N. S. G. W. do not think so. Mr. Langdon was recently a candidate for grand trustee of the order, but the opposition to him was so strong and so aggressive that he deemed it the part of discretion to withdraw. The principal objection urged against Mr. Langdon was that he was a little too conspicuous in politics and that it would not be to the interest of the order to supply him with more prestige for office-seeking purposes. Doubtless this objection filled Mr. Langdon with something akin to amazement for he has been flattering himself that his political record entitled him to anything that he desired. Two years ago he believed that long ere this the people of California would be demanding his election to the office of chief executive of the State. But the ungrateful people have ceased to take any interest in Mr. Langdon, and it appears that even in the fraternal order of which he has been a most active member his light is sputtering to extinction. In the circumstances it were well for Mr. Langdon to give as much attention as possible to the interests of the law firm which he established some time ago. At present this firm has a case in Oakland. The firm's client, curiously enough, is suspected of being an agent of the big tobacco trust.

Contents of Stanton's "Sleeve"

I have questioned all the correspondents of the San Francisco newspapers who were in Sacramento during the last session of the Legislature, asking them what it was that Phil Stanton had "up his sleeve" that made him "feel the ground slipping from under his feet." Each of these correspondents informs me upon his personal knowledge that the Speaker of the House had nothing "up his sleeve," and that the "ground" at no time during the session was observed to be "slipping from under his feet." "Why, then," I asked, "did Speaker Stanton come down from his official perch to say that he felt the ground slipping from under his feet?" Unanimously the correspondents answered: "Because he thought it was the psychological moment in which to bluff the Assembly into acquiescence with the antecedent bluff of President Roosevelt." "And why did he want to assist the Roosevelt bluff?" I inquired. "Because," rejoined the correspondents, "Phil Stanton thought Roosevelt might make him collector of some port or assist him to some office of the gift of the succeeding administration, or because he thought it was the proper political play to advance the personal political interests of Phil Stanton—there is a suspicion that he even believed he had a chance to get the Republican indorsement for Governor." All of which, it will be recalled, is a reminiscence of the last row we had over the "Japanese question," in which Speaker Stanton headed off a lot of anti-Japanese legislation by pretending in the presence of the Assembly that if we insisted on these laws something awful would happen to us—something so mysterious that he could not utter its dreadful import even in a whisper or with bated breath; something that made him "feel the ground slipping from under his feet." Stanton himself has steadily refused to reveal his blood-curdling secret, although he promised at the time that when the danger should be passed he would unbosom himself of his hideous tale. Now we know from trustworthy sources that Stanton's "secret" was a mere phantom of his own imagination, a cock-and-bull invention of a zealous statesman, "a false creation, proceeding from a heat-oppressed brain." I don't know who is most deserving of my sarcastic laughter—Stanton the animated tomb of the dead secret; or the gaping yokels of the Legislature who were so readily gold-bricked by the Speaker of the House while "the ground was slipping from under his feet."

Untrustworthy Testimony

John Walter Wilson was convicted of murdering Harry Boas by means of a poisoned letter. The testimony that convicted Wilson was what is called "expert." Photographic enlargements of Wilson's handwriting were compared with similar enlargements of the writing in the letter, and it was determined that the letter was written by the same hand that wrote the poisoned letter. The experts were all witnesses for the prosecution. Now it is proposed to procure for Wilson a new trial, if possible, on the ground that the expert testimony was not sufficient or conclusive. For myself I do not know whether Wilson is guilty or innocent, but I do know that "expert evidence" is not the best kind of evidence and that it is only considered by juries in the absence of any other kind. The jury in this case had no other, and there was probably no alternative except a conviction. If the defense could have hired "expert testimony" to oppose that offered by the prosecution, there is no question that the "reasonable doubt" necessary to procure the acquittal of the defendant would have been implanted in the minds of the jury and Wilson would have been acquitted. The sort of testimony called "expert" is the most untrustworthy that can be offered for or against any proposition involving the life, liberty or property of a defendant or other litigant. It would be easy even now to provoke a controversy among lawyers over the "pencil wills" in the Fair case; there are many "medical experts" who dispute the verdict of the "alienists" in the Thaw case; and the readers of the newspapers will readily recall many other cases in which the decisions were unsatisfactory because they were rendered wholly upon the testimony of "experts."

Distrusted by Jurists

One of the greatest of law writers has said that the testimony which least deserves credit is that of skilled witnesses. "Required to speak not to facts but to opinions," he says, "it is surprising with what facility and to what an extent their views can be made to correspond with the wishes of the parties who called them." To whatever side of a case an expert becomes attached the triumph of that side becomes to him the consummation most devoutly to be wished. Not always is the expert intentionally unfair, nor does he always wilfully misrepresent, but his judgment becomes so warped by regarding the subject in one point of view that even when conscientiously disposed he is incapable of expressing a candid opinion. It has been said that the beliefs of experts became synonymous with faith as defined by the Apostle and is too often the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen. According to Lord Campbell hardly any weight should be given to the testimony of experts, and according to Justice Gier, "opposite opinions of persons professing to be experts may be obtained to any amount."

AT THE MARINE GARDENS OFF CATALINA ISLANDS

Discrediting an "Expert"

I recall the smashing of an "expert" witness in the second trial of Laura D. Fair in this city many years ago. The question of the guilt or innocence of the defendant narrowed down to the mental condition of Mrs. Fair at the time she killed Crittenden. It was pleaded by her lawyers that she was laboring under "temporary emotional insanity" at the time of the murder. To refute this plea the prosecution called a number of "insanity experts," among them a well-known "alienist" of pompous demeanor and great pretensions. He was subjected to a rigorous cross-examination by Greene Curtis, the leading attorney for the defense; and for a time he managed to hold his own against the lawyer by answering the questions in technical language, complicated definitions and recondite references. Finally Curtis, who had accurately gauged the surpassing vanity of the "mad doc" as Charles Read used to call the members of the alienist tribe, arose with a book open in his hand. "Of course, doctor," Curtis began; "you have read Stoeppel on Insanity?" "Certainly," the expert answered without hesitation; "he is one of the standards." "Then you remember this passage in his chapter on the pathology of neurasthenia," and the lawyer read a long and involved paragraph containing much that sounded like science and a lot that might have been scientific for all that those who listened could have asserted to the contrary. "Are you familiar with that statement by Stoeppel, doctor?" Curtis questioned. "Perfectly familiar," the expert declared confidently. "Then I submit, your honor," the lawyer announced as he passed the book to the Judge, "that this witness doesn't know what he is talking about in this matter. The book from which I have pretended to read is, as your honor perceives, a copy of Greenleaf on Evidence, and I can inform you that there is no such person as Stoeppel and that therefore he could not have written a work on insanity. Stoeppel and his book are creations of my own imagination."

A Distinguished Diplomat

At a recent conference between Consul General Merou, Raphael Weill, Supervisor Payot, Judge Morrow and others, arrangements were completed for the reception of the French Ambassador and the presentation of the "Hero Medal" to San Francisco. It was agreed that the presentation should take place at the Orpheum, the use of which was donated to the city free of charge. The presentation will take place on the morning of June 5th. In the evening there will be a banquet at the Fairmont at Which Mayor Taylor will preside. Speeches will be made by the Ambassador, the Mayor, the President of the State Unitersity, Judge W. W. Morrow, Charles Stetson Wheeler and others. Ambassador Jusserand will arrive with his party on June 4th, and make the Fairmont his home during his stay. The Ambassador, by the way, is a man of distinguished record and of rare literary ability. He is the author of "A Literary History of the English People," of "An English Novel in the Time of Shakespeare," of "Shakespeare in France under the ancien regime," of "A French Ambassador at the Court of Charles the Second" and other works. He is an attorney at law and a Doctor of Letters. He began his political career in 1876 and was appointed Consul to London in 1878. In 1880 he was made assistant to the Chief of the Ministerial Cabinet. He has served as counsellor to the French Embassies at London and Constantinople, and in 1905 he was elected Commander of the Legion of Honor.

favorable attitude toward increased appropriations, based on a definitely systematized method of administration, for the deepening and widening of rivers and harbors and their maintenance in the interests of navigation. Each year, just before Congress convenes, the association holds a convention in Washington, which is addressed by prominent men in touch with conditions all over the country. Affiliated with the National Rivers and Harbor Congress are district organizations working for the improvement of waterways in their own territories. One of these is the River Improvement and Drainage Association of California, which has kept in close communication with the Congress, to the advantage of both. Special Director John A. Fox of the National Rivers' and Harbors' Congress has just paid a second visit to California and will be in San Francisco soon again in the interests of the cause. At the convention of the Counties Committee of The California Promotion Committee held at Del Monte on May 8, he delivered a masterly address in which he pointed out that the plan advocated by the Congress, that government bonds in the sum of $500,000,000 be issued, the money to be available as needed for carrying forward the gigantic work of bettering the highways of commerce was a business proposition with nothing ephemeral about it. The people of the Middle West, the great productive region, are just as much benefited by bettering the harbors as the people on the coasts, for actual betterment of conditions has brought back the cost manyfold in reduced freight rates. In commenting on this Mr. Fox said: "As a nation we have received many times over the money invested in the improvements of our rivers and harbors and there is the greatest reason why the rivers and harbors of the nation should receive regular and liberal appropriations. It is fit and appropriate that such gatherings as this should add their weight to the pressure being brought to bear on Congress to have such appropriations made in order that we may cause great arid and unproductive areas to yield agricultural products and produce a network of intercommunicating water routes upon which our products may be most economically transported."

THE OLD LAMENT

What maketh lads so cruel be?
  Amid the spume and wrack
They pass the door and sail the sea
  And never more come back!

The grey, salt wind winds down the wave;
  The galleon flouts the bay:
And cobles and coggers are raising their sails,
  God keep 'ee, down on the quay!
With a hoist at thy tackle, a haul at thy blocks,
  And a hail to thy hasting crew;—
He'll take 'ee Who gave 'ee thy goldilocks

  Ere I pardon thine eyes o' blue.
Not once to ha' looked within my hood,
  Nor guessed I quailed on the strand
Wi' thee in the boats! Tro' my pent-up door
  I ha' kissed to thee my hand.
But they'll rive thy keel wi' their cannon shocks,
  And sink 'ee and all thy crew:
And they'll leave to the raven and cliff-homed fox
  Thy kindly eyes o' blue.

What made 'ee pass my open door
  Each breaking o' the day?
Why need 'ee take that self-same path
  And never another way?
I'll find 'ee stretched on the grinding rocks
  With a Frenchman's shot shot through
And the mermaid's weed from thy goldilocks
  Across thine eyes o' blue.

  And never once look back!
What made 'ee, lad, so cruel be?
  Beneath the spume and wrack
To pass the door and put to sea

The Hustlers of Santa Cruz

Santa Cruz is wide awake and evidently means to let the rest of the State know it. For over a month past the citizens and commercial bodies have been bending their energies towards advertising the town and it has been largely owing to the individual energy of F. W. Swanton that so much has been accomplished in so short a time. In two days, amongst forty-four merchants, the substantial sum of $21,000 was raised to pay the expenses of advertising. Some of the schemes are decidedly spectacular, and none the less popular on that account. Mr. Swanton has detailed a program which contemplates the distribution of 10,000 balloons and 20,000 Japanese canes. From large balloons advertising matter will be distributed besides tickets conveying to the fortunate finders town lots in the Swanton tract recently thrown on the market. A special train left on May 22nd and will return on the 31st after an itinerary which includes all but the extreme north and south of the State on this side of the Sierras and it is safe to assert that to the people of the towns visited Santa Cruz will be hereafter much more than a name. On Saturday evening, June 5th, the Casino, cottage city and grill will be formally opened with the annual dinner, ball and fireworks.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Cotton.—The edge of the market was taken off at the close of the week by general and moderately heavy rains in Texas, but it is claimed with earnest insistence that this great State has never in its history had such an unfavorable winter and spring season as this year, and even with good rains from now on the damage done already cannot be repaired; and not only a short, but also a late crop, subject more than usual to the attack and ravages from the boll-weevil will be the probable outcome. Louisiana is now in the complete grasp of this pest, and is trying to avoid losses by heavy reductions in the cotton-planted area, while Arkansas and Mississippi are struggling with the first experience with this little insect with the usual result of panic and despair. It may therefore be taken for granted that from one and a half to two million bales will be lost in these four States from drought and weevils without counting on further damage during the trying period of summer and fall. Conditions in Oklahoma have been favorable in the main, but it is an assured fact that the crop in this State has been swapped to wheat and corn. The Atlantic States alone give promise of a good yield, but even here it must be remembered that some of these States produced last year the largest crop ever raised, and to approach again last year's figure, the same faultless weather as in the previous season must be in evidence from now until the end of the year. We are of the opinion that next season the spinner will have a harder struggle to obtain the needed raw material than to procure contracts for yarns and goods, and we again strongly advise our spinner friends to secure the remnant of this season's crop for future use, as prices will in all probability, rule high for some years to come. The rapidly dwindling visible supplies, now 300,000 bales smaller than two years ago, when consumption had not reached this year's figure by some 400,000 bales, maybe pointed out as a danger signal and a prompt heeding of such cautionary signs might prevent unnecessary losses. The stocks in this country are moving out with lightning like rapidity, being now only 140,000 bales in excess of last year, with its small crop, and it begins to look as if the stock at the end of this season will not exceed last year's small figure. What this means with a late crop and increased mill activity can easily be imagined by any one interested in the trade. Bullish enthusiasm continues and there is no telling to what it may lead within the near future, particularly as a Bullish Bureau report is ahead of us. It is luck, rather than expert judgment to hit the highest point, and to secure profit on some long commitments at this level will hardly prove unwise, although we still look for ultimately much higher prices.

Stock.—The security market has been very uninteresting and the public participation has dwindled to almost nothing, leaving operators on the stock exchange largely to room traders. The uncertainty and narrowness of stock movements prevailing have been such as to discourage speculation by the public. However, much significance may be attached to the closing prices of the week which were at about the best. Probably the chief market feature was the selling of Steel common to a new high record. Continued absorption of this stock across 60 without spectacular manipulation indicates much higher price later in the year. Crop conditions appear to be better in most localities although it is too early to make predictions. There is a great stability in the banking business and conditions prevail that will work for continued slow but healthy improvement.

Grain.—The wheat market for the past week has exhibited a revival of the great strength shown during the Patten bull campaign of this month. At that time the high prices were charged to the bull leader, and he was practically forced to leave his office and business because of the abuse heaped upon him for advancing the price of wheat and flour. Now the the market is advancing on conditions which the leader at that time saw developing. The May price recorded during the previous bull campaign was 129¼, went to 130 early this week and later advanced to 132⅜, the highest price recorded here in eleven years. Perhaps one million, five hundred thousand bushels of wheat were covered by scattered shorts at these high prices, Patten being the only seller for that month. All the new crop months have been uniformly strong and advances have mounted from four to five cents for the week. Visible supplies decreased 2½ million and world's stocks decreased nearly six million. Stocks have been reduced sharply at Minneapolis every day for the week; total Northwest decreased 2,200,000 bushels. Regardless of rains which have helped general appearances of the winter crop the experts continue to send bullish reports on Texas, Oklahoma and Kansas. There are bad reports from Missouri, and reports from the soft wheat States east of the river are not encouraging. The spring crop is in the ground all right but late. Duluth shipped about 1,500,000 bushels of wheat to Chicago, none of which has been delivered on May contracts yet. Shipping sales outside milling points have been from 60 to 135,000 bushels a day all week. Cables gives German crop outlook bad, Prussian condition of only 64 and 14 per cent abandoned acreage.

But It Did Happen

Marshall Darrach of New York, who has been entertaining society in San Francisco with his Shakespearean recitals, was warned in advance of what he might expect from an audience of society women who consider their own conversation of greater importance that what any artist may have to impart, whether for instruction or entertainment. The experience of Gabrielowitch, who was driven almost to the verge of desperation at a society concert by the hilarious chatter of a box party was cited, and he was told that it was quite the normal conduct of the elect. "Ah, that will never happen to me," confidently asserted Mr. Darrach in a tone of assumed tragedy. "I have reserved several pertinent lines from Shakespeare which I can interpolate between passages if I happen to be annoyed. Looking straight at the offender I quote thus——" At the Macbeth recital last Thursday morning those who had heard the story trembled with apprehension when Mrs. Francis Carolan interrupted the distinguished speaker in the middle of the play by creating a disturbance because the room was too close for her comfort and insisting that the windows be opened. Nothing happened, however, for Mr. Darrach proved that his manners were perfect.

The Fear of Atavism

A local club man with a well-deserved reputation for biting wit recently remarked that whenever he lunched at the Burlingame Club he became apprehensive of the comfort of certain club members who were playing golf, lest, when the twelve-o'clock whistles blew their atavistic tendencies should assert themselves and clubs be dropped under the momentary hallucination that they were pick handles.

The Distortion of a Nickname

The unsavory Evans-Osborn scandal drags its slow length along at the Mare Island navy yard, and the indiscreet lieutenant whose escapade involved him in the mess is still the victim of the newspaper wits, who imagine that his familiar nickname, "Boy," must have been bestowed upon him by the ladies, but this is wide of the mark. It is one of the regulations governing target practice that the commanding officer of each division shall call out his station at the time of firing. Osborn's stand was at the Red Buoy, and as his voice was of a particularly resonant character, it could be heard above all the succeeding din, and his shipmates conferred on him the name "Buoy," for reasons obvious enough to them, though obscure to the outside world. "Buoy" was readily transformed into "Boy," and "Boy" it seems destined to remain.

They Divided on Dancing

There is an interesting bit of gossip afloat concerning that entertainment given last week for the benefit of St. Paul's church at San Rafael. The news was early circulated that the affair was a brilliant financial success, but the minority report has just been sent forth, from which it would appear that it was a dire failure. In the first place, the charge for admission, two dollars, was rather high, but the really important snag which was struck was the division of opinion over the propriety of fancy dancing at an Episcopal church entertainment. One half thought it proper enough when the object was charitable while the others maintained that however artistic and beautiful, dancing and religion should be in no way combined. Opinions were set on both sides, one faction condemning and refusing positively to attend if the dances were included in the program, and the others just as strenuously insisting that the opposite course should be adhered to. Miss Dibblee gave her dances, and it is said now, to a half-empty auditorium, for the rigidly righteous not only absented themselves, but used their influence to discourage the patronage of others.

Measles, Mumps and Chicken-Pox

An epidemic of infantile maladies seems to be afflicting the adult members of society. Miss Maud Bourne came within a narrow margin of having to forego her part in the Newhall-McBean wedding festivities, owing to an attack of chicken-pox; Charlie Adams, the Beau Brummel of the younger set, was released from quarantine after a period of seclusion with measles just in time to act as host at his theatre party last Saturday, and now we hear that Colonel Bellinger, U. S. A., is having his somewhat short temper still further shortened by being confined to his home with the mumps.

Old Families to be United

A pleasant flutter of surprise was caused by the announcement of the engagement of Miss Marion Fardon Wright, youngest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Kirkham Wright, and Henry C. Campbell. Both these young people belong to an exclusive set and are descendants of prominent early day people. Kirkham Wright is a brother of the late Selden S. Wright, who was an able jurist. General R. W. Kirkham, whose name was bestowed on an Oakland thoroughfare, was an uncle, and Mrs. P. L. Wheeler of this city, a cousin. Mrs. Kirkham Wright was Miss Millie Langley, daughter of the pioneer wholesale druggist Charles Langley, of Langley and Michaels, and Charles Langley is her brother. Young Campbell's father was Henry C. Campbell, and his mother a Miss Johnson, closely related to the Covington Johnsons and Covington Pringles of Oakland. There were three children, Louise, now the wife of Dr. Rixford, Cornelia, who married Harry Yeazell, and the prospective groom. After the death of his first wife Mr. Campbell married the widow of the Rev. Frederick Reed of Sausalito. Miss Marion Wright is one of the handsomest girls in society as well as one of the most popular, and has officiated as bridesmaid more often since her debut than any other of the social belles. Mrs. Edward Torney (Jeannette Wright) was a bride of last year. The wedding will not take place until next year, when it will be one of the most brilliant of home affairs.

The Bender-Young Wedding

Another quiet wedding was that of Miss Ella Margaret Bender and Philip Young of Boston, which was celebrated at the home of the bride's parents. The Rev. Dr. Clampett of Trinity church, assisted by Rev. Dr. Bradley, performed the ceremony. There were no attendants, and only intimate friends of the bride were invited. Notable amongst the guests were the old acquaintances from Nevada and Carson, in which districts the Benders have spent much time. After the informal reception, the usual practical jokes were attempted, notably that of decorating the automobile in which the young people were to depart, and when the vehicle in front of the house had been lavishly garnished with tin cans, old shoes and such memorials, the whisper went round that Mr. Young had detected the activities of his friends and provided for another to meet him at the top of the hill, so a veritable stampede was organized and before the bride and groom were able to escape, Auto No. 2 received a full share of attention. After a short honeymoon trip the Youngs will return to the city for a little while, before their final departure for their home in Boston.

A Waiter's Sympathy

Possibly none suffer so keenly at the hands of ill tempered society women as the waiters, bell boys and maids of the fashionable hotels, and the tales "told below stairs" often bristle with irony and satire born of the long suffering silences while on duty and obliged to accept the insults and indignities heaped upon them by those who sit in the seats of the mighty. The death of a disagreeable woman had been announced in the morning papers, and a patron of the hotel broke the news to a waiter whom he had often watched through moments of martyrdom vainly trying to please her at breakfast, luncheon and dinner. "Well, sir," he responded, "I wishes her no harm, sir, seein' she's dead, but I do hope, sir, where she's gone she'll get her tea hot enough. She was always kickin' that it was too cold, the way we served it here."

Theatricals for Charity

All the younger set in San Rafael are deeply interested in the forthcoming entertainment for the benefit of the bed in the Children's Hospital which has always been maintained by the school over which Miss F. Stewart presides, and all the ladies of social prominence are lending their aid to make the affair a notable success. Mrs. A. W. Foster, Mrs. George M. Pinckard, Mrs. John Boyd and Mrs. Kent of Kentfield are especially active. The pretty little play, "The Stairway of Life," will be given on this occasion, with Miss Leslie Page in the role which was originally assigned to Miss Dollie Cushing, whose participation in social affairs has been temporarily abandoned, owing to the sudden illness of her father, Sidney B. Cushing. Miss Marjorie Foster, too, has been obliged to forego her share in the production owing to an attack of chicken-pox, and Miss Dorothy Partridge will substitute. B. Anderson, D. Gunn, S. Davis and E. Evans are also in the program. There will be a doll to raffle and a grab bag, besides the usual ice cream, refreshments, etceteras.

A Song Recital

On Tuesday last Henri Etlin and Donald Maclean gave a matinee, prior to the departure of Mt. Etlin for Europe, at which they presented some of their most promising pupils, who gave an excellent account of the year's work. Miss Raas showed wonderful promise as a pianiste, playing Liszt's Rhapsody with an artistic comprehension and virtuosity which was highly commendable. The surprise of the afternoon was the singing of Miss Alexander, who has been studying the De Reszke method under Mr. Maclean for the short period of six months. She sang the Heidenroslein of Schubert in a manner that experienced singers might envy. The other pupils acquitted themselves well and showed such admirable results from intelligent training as to place the affair above the ranks of the usual pupil's recital.

Artists at Del Monte

Some new and interesting pictures have been added to the Del Monte Art Gallery, and when the jury met last week there was a general re-hanging. Mrs. Mary Curtis Richardson and Gottardo Piazzoni were not present, but the additions were passed upon by William Keith, Dr. Arnold Genthe, Will Sparks, James King Steele, Miss Evelyn McCormick and Miss Emily Travers. At the end of the gallery hangs Charles Dickman's large canvas, "Caught in the Storm Wind." It is strong and stirring, big in more respects than size. The shimmering light beneath the bowsprit of the fishing boat is very realistic. The subject is spectacular, and Mr. Dickman is to be commended for not yielding to the temptation to exaggerate the fury of the elements. There are three delightful studies of child life by Mrs. Richardson, and these, added to her "Child and Dog," which has been in the gallery for some time, give Del Monte's guests an excellent opportunity to judge of her work. "The Story Book Hour" is a scene in a primary school, an unusual composition with a lovely color scheme. "The White Sunbonnet" shows a dear little mite blinking in the sunshine, and "Beside the Cradle" is another mother and child picture of the kind which Mrs. Richardson handles with much tenderness. C. Chapel Judson sent two canvasses, both scenes near Monterey, with its curving beach in the distance. "Summer" and "Monterey Oaks" are the descriptive titles. Mr. Judson has been fortunate, for more of his pictures have found purchasers than of any other exhibitor. "Ayorra Sacre" is an interest study of oaks in autumnal coloring by Benjamin Brown of Pasadena. Miss Withrow's "Dutch Head" finds many admirers. "Unsettled Weather," "Lowland Pastures" and "Late Afternoon Among the Eucalyptus" are fine specimens of the late Sidney Yard's work. Harry Fonda's "Laguna del Rey," painted near his home in Monterey, is by far the best thing he has exhibited. Not long ago Alice B. Chittenden sent down her Salon picture, a great mass of roses that are all but fragrant. Others of the new additions are "Morning," and "Still Life" by Emily Travers. "The Shady Path," "Oaks" and "Misty Morning" by Anna Bremer, and several sketches by Ferdinand Bergerdoff, the very young man who sold a number of pictures at the last Bohemian Club Exhibition. Mr. Bergerdoff has taken a studio at Carmel-by-the-Sea for the summer. Much interest is taken in the collection of sixteen water colors by Lockwood de Forest that was hung some weeks ago. The scenes are nearly all from the Seventeen Mile Drive, though a few are from Point Lobos and Carmel-by-the-Sea. Amongst the latter are several moonlight effects painted directly from nature by the aid of a candle protected with a red shade, which neutralized the effect of the moonlight on the color box. Mr. de Forest is a New York artist of note, a member of the Century, Salmagundi and Lamb's Clubs. He has made several visits to California, painting up and down the coast. His work is characterized by a simplicity and sureness of touch which suggests a Japanese print. The recent work by Miss DeNeal Morgan shows careful study of the dunes and trees of Carmel-by-the-Sea, where she is established in Sidney Yard's old studio. She sketches early and late and deserves the success that has come to her. Piazzoni's Whistlerian "A Cloud" is one of the best pictures in the gallery. There are two specimens of the work of Matilda Lotz at Del Monte, her "Normandy Calf," and "Deerhound and Terrier." For the last fifteen years this Californian artist has lived and worked in Paris, where she was for a time the pupil of Rosa Bonheur.

but the entertainment arranged to assist the rehabilitation of "Notre Dame des Victoires," the French Catholic church, which will take place on Wednesday night, June 2, at the Garrick, is an exception. On this occasion, for the first time in this city the beautiful symphonic ode for chorus and orchestra, "The Desert," by Felicien David, will be given with an orchestra of thirty and a chorus of fifty under the direction of Rev. H. M. Thiery. The composer drew his inspiration from a prolonged and close communion with the nomadic Arabs. The work is divided into three parts, the first being "The Wilderness," the second, "The Night," and the third, "The Morning." The varied sensations of the Oriental nature, ranging from indolent reverie and mystic prayer to the weird strains of the march and the truly grandiose outbursts of the storm in the desert are depicted with perfect accuracy, if we can depend on the assurances of missionaries and travelers. Worthy of special note are the "Prayer to Allah," the "March of the Caravan," the "Dance of the Maidens," and the "Chant of the Muezzin," which calls the faithful to prayer. The program also promises the overtures to "William Tell," vocal selections by Charles Bulotti, the tenor, specialties by Baby Mildred Koenig and the amusing farce, "Ici on Parle Francaise," by an amateur French company. The church of Notre Dame des Victoires, which stood on Bush street above Grant avenue, was destroyed in the fire three years ago. Seats will be on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s Tuesday and Wednesday. Reserved seats $1.00.

Her Pungent Wit

One of the most interesting young ladies in society is noted for her quick, biting wit and ready repartee. She is never lacking for a telling retort, and her clever remarks are always greeted with applause. It must be admitted, however, that they are occasionally at the expense of others, and frequently reach the ears of those against whom the shafts are directed. This is the fact which explains the sudden cooling of the ardor of at least two suitors whose attentions, ardent in the winter months, suddenly ceased, without apparent rhyme or reason to the interested watchers who were in daily anticipation of an announcement. It had become the regulation thing to invite one of these young men everywhere that the young lady was asked, and society was all ready with its "I told you so" at the promulgation of a third engagement in her family. Whether there would have been one or not nobody now can tell, for some officious friend with more curiosity than discretion, undertook to satisfy herself by teazing the young lady over her latest scalp lock. "Oh, yes," replied the fair lady, in answer to the inquiry, "he's often here, but he's only a charity patient." This summing up of his qualifications reached the youth's ears betimes, and since then he has held himself aloof. That little romance duly shattered, the same busybody noted the attentions of the second victim, the only son of a family connected with one of the largest mercantile establishments on the coast. With her usual tact and discrimination she again applied her probe, with approximately the same satisfactory result, for the fair maid responded: "I can have no romantic regard for a floorwalker. Now they never speak as they pass by.

A June Wedding

The wedding of Miss Frances Reed and Henry Milner Rideout will take place in Sausalito early in June. Miss Reed is the daughter of Rev. Frederick Reed, formerly pastor of Christ Episcopal church, Sausalito, who died abroad several years ago. His widow, who subsequently married the late Henry C. Campbell, a lawyer of some distinction, was Miss Ella Avery, whose own mother, in turn, was the daughter of Henry Stansbury, United States Attorney General during Lincoln's presidency, some of whose fine mental traits have been inherited by the bride to be. Mr. Rideout is a brilliant scholar and for five years was a professor at Cambridge. He is a writer of note, the author of "Dragon's Blood," and other novels. After the ceremony the Rideouts will leave for Boston but will return in the fall to take up their residence in Sausalito.

In the Social Spotlight

At recent wedding dinner in Oakland, where brass buttons were prominent it is said that the cup which cheers and also inebriates was enjoyed to such an extent that one well-known officer left the festive table and making his way to the kitchen cried, "Wine! wine! more wine! I'd rather have wine than a wife."

All the friends of a popular debutante of last year are looking forward to the announcement of her engagement to a certain gallant son of Mars ere long, but I am informed that there is a real surprise in store for them. The engagement will be announced but the party of the second part will be a young man whose allegiance is not to Mars but to music. However, we shall see in good time.

All the friends of Captain and Mrs. Carroll Buck, U. S. A., will be delighted to hear that they are to return to San Francisco early in September. Mrs. Buck was Mrs. Inez Shorb White, the leader of society, daughter of Mrs. J. de Barth Shorb, and everyone is hoping that the Buck will be stationed at the Presido.

Mrs. H. Clay Miller Sr. was hostess at a tea given in honor of Mrs. Max Garber, who will soon leave for the north to join her husband, Lieutenant Garber, U. S. A., at his station.

Miss Marian Miller will spend some time in Ross Valley with the Stuart Baldwins, who have taken the Rowe home for the summer. Miss Laura Rowe is at the Hotel Rafael at present.

Mr. and Mrs. A. B. C. Dohrman have taken the Robert Davis place in Ross Valley for the summer. The Davises will occupy the George Moore home on Broadway in this city until they leave for Pacific Grove to spend the summer.

Mrs. Henry A. Butters, accompanied by the Misses Marie and Marguerite, will leave early in June for an automobile trip to Yosemite, and later in the season will motor to Lake Tahoe.

Miss Edna Cadwálader gave an informal musicale at the home of Miss Huggins in Berkeley, during the week. Frederick Maurer, pianist, Thomas Rieger, cellist, with Miss Cadwalader, violinist, contributed to the enjoyment of about one hundred guests.

Miss Frances Reed was hostess at an informal tea at the pretty home of her mother, Mrs. Campbell in Sausalito, last week, at which, amongst other guests, were Mrs. Walter D. Mansfield and Mrs. William Keith of Goldfield, relatives of Mrs. Avery, the grandmother of the hostess.

Chief Justice and Mrs. Beatty, accompanied by their daughter, Mrs. Alma B. Wright and her two young sons, will pass several weeks at Carmel, Monterey County.

R. D. Bogue, proprietor and manager of the Arlington Hotel, Santa Barbara, spent last week at the Hotel Rafael.

Mr. and Mrs. William Mayo Newhall are passing some weeks at Paso Robles. Miss Elizabeth Newhall has been at Del Monte for a few days with friends, and Mayo Jr. will return early in June to spend his school vacation.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Schmeidell will soon close their Ross Valley home and go to Lake Tahoe, after their yearly custom. They have an ideal camp in Lake County, where they spend the entire summer with their children.

Mr. Martin Meigs left on Saturday for Boston, where he will be married to Miss Mary Weston of that city. Mr. Meigs is a widower, his wife having been Madelaine Moore, the young daughter of Mrs. Agnes Moore of Ross Valley. Mr. Meigs' family is prominent in Santa Barbara, but his future home will be in Boston.

The wedding of Miss Edith Berry, daughter of Mrs. Jessie Patton Berry, to Lloyd Baldwin was a very quiet affair celebrated at the home of the bride's mother. Every detail was of the simplest, though at the same time the most dainty and appropriate. Rev. Edward Morgan officiated, and the bride was tertained, after the matinee, Mrs. Amelia Tozitti, Mrs. A. D. Henderson, Mrs. Joseph Keenan, Mrs. M. H. McCauley, Mrs. Franc Marchante and Miss Grace Ranborn.

On the afternoon of May 18th the San Rafael Bridge Club was entertained by Mrs. L. L. Baker in her suite at the Hotel Rafael. Tea was served during the afternoon.

A number of the delegates to the convention of women's clubs at Del Monte last week took advantage of the proximity to quarter themselves at Pacific Grove. Amongst them were Mrs. Florence Richmond, who occupied "Wee Housie," the pretty bungalow which belongs to Grace Hibbard; Mr. and Mrs. William Lorentz, ensconced in a pretty cottage on Sixth street, where they will be comfortable until after the bankers' convention to be held next week, and Mrs. M. H. E. Laeffler of Stockton. Mrs. James B. Hume, State President of the Woman's California Federated Clubs, with Miss Blanche Morse, State Corresponding Secretary and Mrs. W. V. Grimes, the recently elected District President and who is prominent in the Pacific Grove Woman's Civic Club, were entertained on Monday by the Santa Cruz Saturday Afternoon Club. They were also the guests of honor at a luncheon at which Mrs. George Montell was hostess.

Former Governor Folk of Missouri was entertained at an informal luncheon at the Fairmont on Tuesday, his hosts being James D. Phelan and Miss Mollie Phelan.

Mrs. Francis Carolan entertained Mr. and Mrs. Willis Polk, Mrs. Page Brown and Miss Katrina Page-Brown at an informal luncheon at the Fairmont.

Baron and Baroness Uriu have been the motifs of much entertaining during their stay at the Fairmont. The Baron is a graduate of the Naval Academy at Annapolis and is en route to attend the graduating exercises and the reunion of his own class. The Baroness is also a graduate of an American college, having been one of the five young women selected by the Japanese government to receive a Western education. Vassar is her alma mater.

Dr. and Mrs. P. L. Wheeler, accompanied by the Misses Wheeler and Kirkham Wheeler, will leave shortly for Applegate, Auburn, to be gone several months.

Mr. and Mrs. Walter D. Mansfield were hosts at an artistic dinner given at the San Rafael Country Club to Baron and Baroness Von Schroeder, who with their attractive daughters, left during the week for their ranch in San Luis Obispo County.

An interesting piano recital will be given on Saturday afternoon at the residence of Mrs. J. M. Masten, 3954 Washington street. The participants will be the juvenile pupils under the instruction of Miss Maud C. Atkins, and as the ages of the children range but from eight to fourteen, the program, which is an ambitious one for such young pupils, will be a veritable test of their accomplishment.

Mr. Edward M. Greenway was host at a dinner given last week at the San Rafael Country Club. His guests were Mr. and Mrs. James Follis and Mr. and Mrs. George Martin.

Amongst the guests at the Tavern of Tamalpais for the week ending May 24th, were Jenny Anderson, Burns McDonald, Miss Younger, Miss L. E. Hoag, Wm. Hebling, Walter J. Fitzpatrick, Mrs. Walter J. Fitzpatrick, L. R. Cullen, Lillian Harris Coffin, J. R. Garnett, Jean M. Baldwin, Mrs. John Biller, Mrs. M. J. Boyle, and Harold Bingham.

Quite a number of agreeable entertainments were given at the Hotel Victoria during the week, amongst them Miss Callahan's afternoon tea on Thursday and Mrs. Moss's dinner for six in the private dining room. This room, with its beautiful decorations of mirrors and grape vines, is growing in favor with the guests for their exclusive affairs, and Mrs. Morris is such an adept in carrying out details that they are always a success. She will have charge of Castle Craig also this summer, and the two hostelries will be operated in conjunction.

San Franciscans registered at Hotel del Coronado for the week ending May 22nd, were J. T. Hughes, Mr. and Mrs. A. F. Luening, Maurice Casey, Mr. and Mrs. I. F. Morris, Mr. and Mrs. S. N. Friedman, child and nurse, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Harrison, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Hine, Miss Beatrice Yrell, Mrs. H. D. Broderick. From Oakland, Mrs. Henry Kahn, Miss Sarah Kahn and Mrs. Harry Hoffman.

Arrivals at Aetna Springs for the week were Mrs. S. B. McNear, Mrs. Sarah Coffin, Mr. and Mrs. H. G. Poett, Mr. John C. Kittle and Mr. W. W. Thurston, entertained by Mr. and Mrs. E. C. Schmeidell. Mr. and Mrs. L. J. Holton motored to the springs, entertaining Mr. and Mrs. P. S. Dyer of Easton, Penn., and Mr. J. W. Goodrich of San Francisco.

New arrivals registered at the Hotel Rafael during the week were Mrs. S. Gump, Mr. and Mrs. S. Heller, Miss R. B. Davis, Mr. Ray Davis, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Holzenberg, Mr. H. W. Smith, Mr. H. F. Henson, Mr. R. J. Meeney, Mr. M. Geenbaum, Mr. J. B. Hyde Smith, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Fisher, Mr. and Mrs. L. B. Scribner, Mr. E. J. Vogel, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Patterson, Mr. Jean B. Hayes, Mrs. E. R. Sill, Mrs. S. J. Barrell, Mr. Morris Clark, Mr. William Clark, Mrs. H. L. Terwilliger, Mrs. George H. Rowe and son, Mr. Edward E. Sanborn, C. R. Johnson and family, Mr. L. Greenebaum, Mrs. H. D. Rose Coghlan in Jack Straw

By Theodore Bonnet

When John Drew visited us a year or so ago with the bewitching Billy Burke he suffered that sparkling actress to put him in penumbra. By the very charm of her personal quality Billy Burke dominated the performances and there were some theatregoers who were not at all pleased at the subordination of their idol. This year Mr. Drew is associated with Rose Coghlan, an actress who comes down to us from a former generation, a past mistress of the scenic art who obtained the radiance of a star and dazzled with her effulgence long before the nebular Drew had emerged from "stock"; and once again the popular drawing-room actor does something less than divide the honors. The current subordination of Mr. Drew is not to be attributed, however, to the inferiority of his method or the waning of his magnetism. He is still the efficient captain of his difficult art, skilled as ever in the superficialities of exclusive elegance; in the outer show of politenesses as eloquent an object lesson as in the heyday of his career. But it is impossible for Mr. Drew to place himself beyond the exigencies of Mr. Maugham's somewhat farcical comedy. The play is called "Jack Straw," and Mr. Drew plays Jack Straw as he plays everything—without eradicating his personal identity. As we all know, Mr. Drew is a perfect impersonator of the character of John Drew. Of that character he has made an exhaustive study, and he shrewdly insinuates its spirit into all roles. But Jack Straw is only nominally the central, pivotal figure of the Maugham comedy. If Mr. Maugham had called his play "The Impossible Mrs. Jennings" and thus have more aptly described it, no manager could have been cozened into assigning the part of Jack Straw to a star. While the play is in a measure about Jack Straw, while it deals with his exploits and his sentimental aspirations, yet the audience is more deeply interested in Mrs. Parker Jennings than in any one else; or, at least, its attention is more frequently and more saliently engaged by Mrs. Parker Jennings than by any other character in the play. For that impossible bounder and mushroom aristocrat supplies the motive of the plot and carries on its development. It was to punish and humiliate the vulgar parvenu, Mrs. Jennings, that Lady Wanley introduced Jack Straw to her as an archduke, believing him to be a waiter. To impress the audience with the idea that the trick was justifiable the playwright gives great prominence to the Jennings family, the most interesting member of which is the coarse-grained mother, a Madame Malaprop, as unrefined of feeling as of manner. In Rose Coghlan this character finds most satisfying incarnation, spiritually and visually. A past-mistress of the scenic art, Rose Coghlans' mimetic method is as effective as though it were distinctly of the modern school of dramatic artifice. She rowdies and swaggers, frets and fumes in ways that reveal a faculty of expression endlessly varied, with an elaboration of method that makes Drew's self-exposition seem absolutely devoid of imagination. But let it not be understood that I do not appreciate Drew. Having seen him in Shakespeare and in romantic drama I know that he has consummate ability, but of late years I have seen him cast exclusively in roles that call for naturalism that is almost characteristic. Even as the waiter in Jack Straw he does not have to abandon his drawing-room manners. He is a waiter in polite society, but he is not even humble; he is far from servile. He abstains from airy superiority of speech, but the hall-mark of elegance is ever visible. There is, however, no incongruity in the characterization, for after all, the waiter is in reality an archduke incognito. And as such Mr. Drew makes it apparent that he is familiar with the modes and manners of fastidious leisure. He is to the manner born, not of a waiter, but of a gentleman who occasionally trips it lightly at hunt-balls and spices Burlingame conversaziones. In short Jack Straw is the perennial John Drew even to the lift of his eyebrows and the familiar mumbled and incoherent interrogatory. The Drew mannerisms that have been worn to a frazzle in the service of Thespis are as fetching as ever. And for those mannerisms that go so well with his graceful port John Drew is much admired; they betoken such naturalness! such feeling! such finesse! In company with Rose Coghlan Mr. Drew gives a radiant and riant performance. As for the play, it is an excellent sample of the technique that treats old stage material in a new way. The success of it must be attributed largely to the genius of players who have at their ready command all the resources and makeshifts of their beloved art.

Stage

"Arizona" at the Alcazar

"Arizona," Augustus Thomas's play, generally conceded to be the best portrayal of the West ever put on a stage, will be the offering of the Alcazar stock company beginning next Monday evening. It will mark the first appearance of stage director Fred J. Butler as an actor this season and also introduce Louis Bennison to the theatre's patrons, a player who comes with a reputation for cleverness and extensive experience. The scene of "Arizona" is laid in the territory of that name, and the bare outline of the plot will give but a faint idea of the charm and atmosphere conveyed through stage craft and dialogue. The groundless jealousy of the aged Colonel Bonham, commanding the Eleventh United States Cavalry, who suspects his young wife of being infatuated with Lieutenant Denton, leads to endless complications. Denton is really the suitor of Mrs. Bonham's unmarried sister. The soldiers on march halt at the ranch of Henry Canby, the father of both ladies, where Captain Hodgeman, an unscrupulous libertine, who has ruined Lena, the daughter of Sergeant Keller, induces the Colonel's lady to elope with him. The plot is frustrated by Denton, who, rather than explain the circumstances to the old soldier, resigns and turns cowboy. He is made captain of a troop of cavalry organized to take part in the war with Spain. One of Canby's vaqueros, a Spaniard named Tony Mostano, is in love with Lena, when he discovers the condition of affairs, shoots Hodgeman, and again Denton is accused of a crime he did not commit. A military court martial ascertains that the bullet found in Hodgeman's body was fired by Tony, who then confesses and rides away and the persecuted Denton comes to his own. Will R. Walling has been cast for the role of Denton, Louis Bennison as Colonel Bonham, Fred J. Butler as Canby, Howard Hickman as Hodgeman, Ernest Glendenning as Tony, Evelyn Vaughan as the colonel's wife, Bessie Barriscale as Lena, and all the other favorites in suitable parts, with a whole army of soldiers and cowboys to fill out the pictures.

Princess Theatre

George Ade's musical comedy, "Peggy From Paris," is proving one of the happiest vehicles the clever Princess

Theatre company has had for the display of its talents. The production is beautiful and elaborate and there is every evidence that money has been expended with lavishness as well as with good taste. The cast may safely challenge comparison with any that have preceded it. May Boley is a tower of strength as Sophie Blotz and never has she appeared to better or more humorous advantage. Fred Mace, without any facial disfiguration, makes a great comic hit as Cicero J. Crampis and is the more to be commended from the fact that he accomplishes it by only the most legitimate means. Budd Ross is very funny as Reginald Hickey, appropriately styled a useful boy, for he sings, dances, and mimics to the general joy of the audiences. James Stevens' splendid baritone delights in the role of Alexander Nerveen and Bert Phoenix and Walter Catlett ludicrously caricature the delegates of the Franco-American League. Zoe Barnett contributes in a great measure to the success of the performance by very dainty and clever representation of Peggy Plummer. Merle Stanton deserves great praise for her really artistic portrayal of Mrs. Montague Fish. Marie Nelson, a new soprano, captures the audiences with her high notes. Then there is Edwin Emery whose delineation of Montague Fish is really artistic. Reginald Travers, another excellent actor gives a clever character sketch of Captain Alonzo Plummer. Oliver Le Noir, Ellen Crane and Jennie Metzler in the remaining characters afford complete satisfaction. "Peggy From Paris" can concientiously be commended as a delightful entertainment. It is a happy combination of mirth and melody. In consequence of the great demand for seats it will be continued another week

"Great Divide" at Ye Liberty

For the week commencing with a special matinee next Monday afternoon (Memorial Day), the Bishop Players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will offer the first popular price production given around the bay of "The Great Divide," a play entirely new to stock audiences on the coast. As everyone who has at all kept in touch with recent theatrical history knows, "The Great Divide" is one of the most conspicuous dramatic successes of recent years. When originally produced at the Princess Theatre, New York, with Henry Miller and Margaret Anglin in the leading roles it ran for an entire season, and was later played by Mr. Miller in all the large cities of the country with the same great success. Miss Anglin in her recent tour of Australia repeated her American triumphs in the play, and Henry Miller is at present completing arrangements for his appearance in the play in London next season. As those who saw Mr. Miller in this piece last fall will remember "The Great Divide" has all the qualifications that go to make a play a successful attraction for stock companies. It contains many excellent acting roles and offers unlimited scope for a display of the scene painter's art. The Ye Liberty management promise that their production of the piece next week will be complete in every respect. Certainly the theatre's enormous revolving stage can be used to splendid effect in depicting the greatness of the Arizona desert, the scene of the second act, which can be reproduced upon it as it could on no other stage. The cast, too, will be adequate. Miss Helen Holmes and Landers Stevens will assume the roles originated by Henry Miller and Margaret Anglin, and will have the support of the complete strength of the company. "The Great Divide" will be given for positively one week only, with the regular Saturday and Sunday matinees.

At the Van Ness

John Drew will continue at the Van Ness all next week, with performances every evening except Sunday, and on Wednesday and Saturday afternoons. Following John Drew at the Van Ness Theatre will be seen Ethel Barrymore in her most pronounced success, "Lady Frederick," a comedy in three acts by the author of "Jack Straw." In the comedy Miss Barrymone is seen as an Irish widow.

MABEL HITE AND MIKE DONLIN
Who will appear next week at the Orpheum.

She will be surrounded by the original New York company including Bruce McRae. The scenes of the play are laid in a fashionable hotel in Monte Carlo. The advance sale of seats begins next Thursday.

Rare Vaudeville

The mere mention of the attractions for next week at the Orpheum will cause connoisseurs to sit up and take notice. First and foremost on the list is the handsome and dashing Broadway comedienne Mabel Hite and her famous husband Mike Donlin whose remarkable achievements on the diamond have contributed so greatly to the success of the New York "Giants." The two will appear in a sketch specially written for them by Vincent Bryan entitled "Stealing Home" which is particularly timely and happy and has scored a tremendous hit wherever it has been presented. A special feature of the coming program is Claude Gillingwater, who it will be remembered, recently shared the honors with Fritzi Scheff in "Mlle. Modiste." Mr. Gillingwater will present a sketch of his own composition called "A Strenuous Rehearsal" in which he impersonates an actor manager who adds to his income by the tuition of stage struck aspirants. The other new acts will be the Avedano Italian Grand Opera Quartette; Billy Van, the renowned minstrel, and the greatest of all European musical novelties, The Vindobonas, whose fine music and ludicrous and fantastic humor have earned for them abroad the title of "The Mad Musicians." Next week will be the last of Peter Donald and Meta Carson, The Baader-La Velle Trio and the novel singing and dancing production Sunny South with Johnson and Wells and ten colored players. A series of recently imported and most interesting Orpheum Motion Pictures will conclude a program that has rarely been equaled and never surpassed.

In the Limelight

Miss Marie Doro, during her present tour in "The Morals of Marcus," has in preparation for magazine publication an elaborate article on J. M. Barrie's comedy, "What Every Woman Knows" based on the skillful conclusion that the wonderful quality of Barrie's humor is its underlying note of pathos; and the wonderful quality of his pathos is the underlying note of humor.

Bruce McRae will be the leading man in Ethel Barrymore's production of "Lady Frederick," the comedy from the pen of the author of "Jack Straw."

It looks as though all San Francisco will turn out to give "The Merry Widow" a truly American reception on the Fourth of July when that young woman makes her first appearance at the Van Ness Theatre.

PROOF POSITIVE

A convict at a French penal settlement, who was undergoing a life sentence, desired to marry a female convict, such marriages being of common occurrence. The Governor of the colony offered no objection, but the priest proceeded to cross-examine the prisoner.

"Did you not marry in France?" he asked.

"Yes."

"And your wife is dead?"

"She is."

"Have you any document to show that she is dead?"

"No."

"Then I must decline to marry you. You must produce some proof that your wife is dead."

There was a pause, and the bride prospective looked at the would-be groom.

Finally he said: "I can prove that my former wife is dead."

"How will you do so?"

"I was sent here for killing her."

The bride accepted him notwithstanding.

First Little Girl—Oh, you told a lie. You'll go to hell if you tell lies. Second Little Girl—Hell? Where's that? "What! You a good Methodist and don't know where hell is?" "No, I don't. They don't teach geography in our class."

Little Bobby has been forbidden to ask for dessert. The other day they forgot to serve him, and, as Bobby is very obedient, he remained silent, although much affected. "Josephine," said the father, "pass me a plate." "Won't you have mine, papa?" cried little Bobby; "it is very clean."

Judge Talcott's little daughter was the youngest child in school, and with her big, blue eyes, golden curls, and adorable little mouth she was by far the prettiest. One day as she led the class down the aisle past the platform, the teacher laid a detaining hand on her shoulder, for the practiced eye caught unmistakable traces of peppermint candy around the rosy lips. "Why, Bessie," she exclaimed, reproachfully, "you have been eating candy in school!" "Oh no, Mith Thmith," was the naive reply, "I really and truly haven't. It wath the little boy that thits bethide me."

The teacher of a Sunday-school class approached one little fellow who was present for the first time, and inquired his name, for the purpose of placing it on the roll. "Well," said the youngster, "they call me Jimmie, for short; but my maiden name is James."

Little Tommy had seen his mamma make custards with meringue on them. One day his mamma sent him to see if his papa was ready for dinner. He found the father with lather on his face, getting ready for a shave. Tommy came back, and said, "No, mamma, papa has meringue all over his face, and can't come now."

Little Mary, in whose village electric lights were for the first time in use, stood looking thoughtfully at the moon, riding high in the heavens and finally said: "Well, God, you needn't send the moon here any more; we've got electric lights now."

Old Gentleman—Do you mean to say that your teachers never thrash you? Little Boy—Never! We have moral suasion at our school. Old Gentleman—What's that? Boy—Oh, we get kep' in, and stood up in corners, and locked out, and locked in, and made to write one word a thousand times, and scowled at and jawed at, and that's all.

A gentleman took his little daughter to a toy shop to buy her a doll. "Now, what sort of a doll would you like, my dear?" said he, as a large assortment was placed on the counter by the shopman. After some hesitation the little miss replied, "I think I'll have twins, please."

"Which is worse, to tell a lie or to steal?" asked a child of its mother. The mother, taken by surprise, replied that both were so bad that she couldn't tell which was the worse. "Well," said the little one, "I've been thinking a good deal about it, and I think that it is worse to lie than to steal. If you steal a thing you can take it back, unless you've eaten it, and then you can pay for it. But"—and there was a look of awe in the little face—"a lie is forever."

know that they have existed. There will be no reason to re-

have no reason to be especially proud of him as a mere ancestor, and I have much reason to be dissatisfied with him for not managing to arrange matters so that the monarchy could re-

King Cole among the royalties of my line; Solomon, Zoroaster, and Job, Isaiah, Esdras, Obadiah, Daniel and Jonah among the literary celebrities who have added luster to my illustrious an-pride of ancestry, but for other reasons than that which I have given for my dislike of Menes the Egyptian. I don't repudiate those of my ancestors who were hanged merely because they were subjected to that ignominious death, although I would of course prefer to know that they were beheaded or drawn and quartered, but so many of them perished on the scaffold high for ignoble crimes that I am quite willing to consign them to history and read that one of your ancestors was hanged for stealing sheep, or that another was gibbeted for picking the pocket of an ancestor of E. P. F. Troy or an ancestor of James D. Phelan. There are some crimes of our ancestry that can never be forgiven, not because of their enormity or their heinousness, but because they have a tendency to make their descendants ridiculous. We may be proud of a regicide or two in our families and we may even tolerate a few highwaymen and forgers; but an ancestor who would stoop to the robbery of a Troy or a Phelan merits only censed of possessing him.

Auto Notes

One feature of a large factory devoted exclusively to rubber covered wires and cables, which the Diamond Rubber Co. erected a couple of years ago, is now attracting considerable attention in the automobile trade. This is the division devoted to igniter cables for automobiles. The subject is one to which the motoring public and the trade in general have given comparatively little attention. "How many automobiles owners know, for instance, that poor insulation, due to ageing of the rubber, or other cause, allows the 'juice' to leak and produces a weak spark? How many know what constitutes high quality or otherwise in igniter cables?" These are a few of the questions The Diamond Rubber Co. is asking with a view to obtaining serious and intelligent consideration of the proposition that the importance of good service from these cables is scarcely secondary to that of good service from tire equipment. "We are making primary and secondary igniter cables of a quality which resists breaking at the terminals, resists deterioration and the troubles which arise therefrom," said O. J. Woodward of The Diamond Rubber Company. "We have found that much less attention than the subject deserves has been paid to the cable question by the trade in the past; but there is seldom a man who isn't interested when the possible range in qualities in this field and the results to be expected, are once made clear."

After thirty-eight days of continuous driving over roads of all descriptions and during which time 2,637 miles have been covered, the official Glidden tour pathfinder car, a Studebaker F-M-F "30," concluded its labors in Kansas City, Mo., which city is to be the terminus this season of the Glidden tour. The following telegram announcing this was received by the Studebaker Bros. yesterday: "E-M-F '30' Glidden pathfinding car arrived 8:30 o'clock finishing journey of 2,637 miles covering thirty-eight days of continuous driving. Driver, passengers and car fresh as daisies and ready for another trip."

Ivan de Jough tells an interesting story of the accident which befell the Chalmers-Detroit Roadster which he drove in the Santa Rosa Road Race. At the end of the first three miles the car was running at the rate of 68 miles an hour and had made the distance fifteen seconds better than its nearest competitor. At this point the car began to drag, and de Jough could not account for the loss of speed. Nothing seemed wrong with the engine, but as the speed continued to lessen at the end of the eighth mile he determined to investigate, and was amazed to find one rear tire gone. It was fortunate that he stopped at that time for the rim had worn down until it was on the point of collapsing. Neither de Jough nor his driver know when the tire was lost, but they are both convinced that it was thrown at the end of the third mile as there was nothing else wrong that could have pulled down the speed.

Charles Laugenour of Woodland has purchased a six-cylinder forty horsepower Thomas Flyer from the Pioneer Automobile Company. This will be the first six-cylinder car in Yolo County. Mr. Lougenour left for home in the new car today, accompanied by Charles Allen, mechanical expert of the Pioneer Automobile Company. Allen will teach Lougenour, who is a novice, to operate the machine.

S. M. Phillips, agent for the Thomas, Oldsmobile and Chalmers-Detroit at Sacramento is in this city. He reports that as the street and road conditions near the capital are being improved, the demand for the high class cars there grows steadily. From a city which a short time ago was considered a poor field by the automobile trade, Sacramento has grown to be one of the best markets for cars in the State. This has been brought about in a large measure by extensive improvements in the streets of the city and the roads of Sacramento County.

The new style Chalmers-Detroit "30" roadster has arrived and is attracting much attention in the showrooms of the Pioneer Automobile Company. It is fitted with a covered dash and an extension hood that gives it a racy appearance. Trimmed in green, the machine presents one of the most attractive types of the small machine ever brought to this coast.

Crawford's Last Novel

"The White Sister" is the last of F. Marion Crawford's novels, completed shortly before his death, and if it is not his best, at least it is very good, for he was one of those who held it to be the duty of the fictionist to tell a story, not to fulminate a tract or hold up literary "good examples." He always had a story to tell and he always told it entertainingly. Like "In the Palace of the King, "The White Sister," was, to a certain extent written to order. It was designed for stage production, but the author preferred to work first in his accustomed medium and afterward to extract the drama from the romance. The theme in this instance is the curious complications resulting from the actions of an extremely radical Catholic nobleman, "more Papist than the Pope," who, living in Rome, refused to bow to the civil law. He would not have his religious marriage ratified by a civil ceremony, nor would he register the birth of his only child, a daughter. In consequence, when he was killed in an accident and no will was found amongst his papers, his wealth passed to his blood relatives and Angela found herself legally a nameless foundling and a pauper. While her father had been negotiating a marriage for her after the approved style of his rank and race, the girl, who had been left much to herself, had fallen in love with a young officer of artillery, ardent but penniless. Giovanni Severi, unlike the picture usually painted of the continental suitor, was as ready to marry the girl after as before her misfortune, but, unfortunately he had not the means to establish a home. He was given an appointment to lead an expedition into the wilds of Africa, with the assurance that on his return the way would be opened to preferment, and as his absence would not be longer than the conventional period of mourning, he left Angela in Rome, under the guardianship of her old governess while he departed on his mission. The whole command was massacred, and Angela, grief stricken, decided to devote her life to the duties of a trained nurse, and to apply such good works as she could accomplish to the amelioration of the spiritual condition of her betrothed. It was not her intention to become a member of the religious sisterhood at first, but circumstances decided her to follow that course. Scarcely, however, had she taken the irrevocable vows when Giovanni Severi reappeared on the scene after a five years captivity during which he had had no means of communicating with the world. Then arose a new conflict for, being one of the steadfast kind, Severi had never for a moment relinquished the idea of marrying Angela should she be alive on his return, and it seemed to him but logical that, their engagement to marry having antedated her profession, it should cancel her relegious vows. Angela, on the other hand, though her devotion to her lover had never faltered, had believed him to be dead and had, in a sense, offered her life for his. The arguments by which he tried to persuade her to apply for a Papal dispensation, as well as the discussion carried on not without heat between the lover and Monsigneur Ipolyte Sarascinesca throw an interesting light on the ramifications of Italian civil law and church rule. As "The White Sister" is already offered in its dramatic form it will be revealing no secrets to admit that a happy ending was the culmination of the intensely dramatic situation. While F. Marion Crawford never wrote a deliberately religious novel and held no brief for the church, he yet has done more than any of the controversialists to make plain the attitude of the Catholic church on many questions, as he has, likewise, taught us that modern Rome is not a mediaeval city. The Macmillan Company, who have published all the late Crawford books in this country, are the sponsors of "The White Sister," and have given it a dress which is worthy of it.

A CHANCE FOR ALL

How a Few Dollars Invested Now Will Give Any Man a Start in the Great West—People Want Land. They Realize There Never Was But One Crop and There Never Will be Another

There are thousands of acres of good agricultural land left in the western states that can be purchased for nearly nothing. The firm of H. B. Sanders & Co., Judge Building, Salt Lake City, Utah, have an option on over a quarter of a million acres that they are offering at $2.95 an acre. This land is scattered all over the State of Nevada and there is lots of it that will grow crops without irrigation. Some of it adjoins towns and can be used as additions to townsites. Other pieces especially that lying adjacent to rivers and creeks would make excellent fruit land.

The above land was selected 25 years ago when the entry man had his choice of all the lands of the state. H. B. Sanders & Co. furnish a catalogue of these lands free upon application. The above firm make a specialty of lands. They can sell you Timber Lands in the Northwest, Oil Lands in California or Utah, Fruit Lands, Irrigated Lands, or Agricultural Lands in any Western State. They make a specialty of State Lands, Railroad Lands, Land Scrip and Land Grants. They secure control of large tracts and sell at small profits. The above firm has secured all the irrigated lands of the Green River Valley Land & Water Co. The largest Carey Act withdrawal of Fruit Lands in the United States. Any person wishing to make an investment in Western Lands should certainly write the above firm.

Estate of YIESEL CAHEN, sometimes known as YIESEL KAGAN, and sometimes known as JOSSEL KAGAN, Deceased.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned Administrator of the estate of Yiesel Cahen, sometimes known as Yiesel Kagan and sometimes known as Jossel Kagan, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within ten months after the first publication of this notice to the said Administrator at his office, Room No. 1305 Merchants Exchange Building, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of Yiesel Cahen, sometimes known as Yiesel Kagan, and sometimes known as Jossel Kagan, deceased. EDWARD T. HOUGHTON, Administrator of the Estate of Yiesel Cahen, sometimes known as Yiesel Kagan, and sometimes known as Jossel Kagan, Deceased.

Dated, San Francisco, May 22, 1909.

OCTAVE G. DUPY, Attorney for said Administrator,
No. 1305 Merchants Exchange Building, San Francisco, Cal. 5-22-5

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY SALE OF REAL PROPERTY SHOULD NOT BE MADE.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 4870 N. S. Dept. 10, Probate.

In the Matter of the Estate of DAVID W. FRAZER, Deceased.

JOSEPH A. STULZ, Administrator of the estate of DAVID W. FRAZER, deceased, having presented his petition herein, duly verified, praying for an order of the sale of the whole of the real estate of the said deceased, or so much or such parts thereof as said Court shall judge necessary or beneficial for the reasons and purposes in petition mentioned and set forth.

And such petition having been filed, it is now ordered by said Court that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased be, and they are hereby directed to appear before said Court on Tuesday, the 22nd day of June, 1909, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the courtroom of Department 10 of said Superior Court in the Grant Building, on the southeast corner of Market and Seventh Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, to show cause, if any they have, why an order should not be granted to said Administrator to sell the whole or so much of the real estate of said decedent as may be necessary.

It is further ordered that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for four successive weeks in Town Talk, a newspaper printed and published in the said City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Dated, San Francisco, this 19th day of May, A. D. 1909.

THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge.

Endorsed: Filed May 19, 1909. H. I. Mulcrevy, Clerk. By E. B. Gilson, Deputy Clerk.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Dept. No. 10, No. 20,925.

WINIFRED TRUBY, Plaintiff,
vs.
JAMES MICHAEL TRUBY, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to JAMES MICHAEL TRUBY, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's failure to provide plaintiff herein with any of the necessaries of life; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 20th day of January, A. D. 1909.

(Seal) H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 22419, Dept. No. 10.

HILDA M. WILSON, Plaintiff,
vs
FRANK J. WILSON, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to Frank J. Wilson, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion of plaintiff; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 14th day of April, A. D. 1909. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 894 N. S. Dept. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of CAROLINE F. PLUNKETT, Deceased.

LUCY M. F. WANZER, executrix of the last will and testament of Caroline F. Plunkett, deceased, having filed herein a petition praying for an order from this Court authorizing, directing and empowering her to renew a note and mortgage in the sum of twenty-four hundred (2400) dollars and for that purpose to borrow said sum and for the purpose of securing the payment of such sum to mortgage to the lender of such money that certain real property of said estate situate in said City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point on the easterly line of San Jose Avenue, distant thereon 149 feet from the northerly line of Twenty-fifth Street, and running thence northerly along the said easterly line of San Jose Avenue thirty-seven (37) feet, thence at right angles easterly ninety (90) feet, thence at right angles southerly thirty seven (37) feet, thence at right angles westerly ninety (90) feet, to the said easterly line of San Jose Avenue and the point of commencement, together with the improvements thereon—said property being a portion of Block 169 Mission Addition.

It is ordered that all persons interested in said estate be and appear before this Court at the courtroom, Department 10, Grant Building, in said City and County, on the 31st day of May, 1909, then and there to show cause why said order should not be made. This notice shall be published in a newspaper of general circulation for two successive weeks.

May 10th, 1909. THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge.

Current Beliefs and Superstitions

If you want a cat to stay at home rub its paws on the stove.

To keep a new dog measure its tail with a cornstalk and bury the latter under the front doorstep.

A family should never move except in the "light" or increase of the moon. This will secure prosperity and increase of possessions.

If a woman is making soap and a man stirs it the soap will be good, but should a strange woman stir it the soap will spoil in the making.

In setting out fruit trees a woman should hold the tree upright while a man sets it and tamps the earth about the roots. This secures prolific crops.

Ashes must not be taken from the fireplace of a sick-room nor should the bed of a sick person be turned over, lest the patient surely die.

A baby should always be carried upstairs before down to secure its "rise in the world."

All vegetable root crops must be planted "in the dark of the moon," else they will grow above ground. Grain and fruit crops must be planted "in the light" or they will fail to produce a crop.

Bees must always be told any news of importance that affects the family of their keeper, else they will be affronted by the neglect and desert their hives. A man addicted to the use of profane language cannot keep bees. They will not countenance his impiety by remaining with him.

If there is a thunderstorm while a hen is brooding the chicks that hatch will all be crazy.

"Mend your clothes upon your back
Poverty you'll never lack.

Another version is "For every stitch you take upon you, some body'll tell a lie about you."

If a man has his hair cut while the moon is in Leo it will grow shaggy like the mane of a lion. If he patronizes the barber when Luna is in Aries he may rejoice in curling locks.

If three men light pipes, cigars or cigaretes from the same match one of them will die before the end of the year. Three lights placed in a straight line portend a death.

Hair combings should never be thrown out doors, else the birds may pick them up and fly away with them and the one whose head was bereft will become bald.

Shoes should always be placed at night with the toes pointing towards the door, in order to insure that their owner will be able to walk out in the morning.

Always show your money to the new moon the first time you see it. Turn your coin over and you will double it before the next new moon.

AN ACCIDENT

Bystander—Come, cheer up, old man. You may not be so badly hurt after all!

Victim—How can I tell how badly hurt I am until after I have seen my lawyer?

OVERHEARD IN THE TENDERLOIN

She—That's a beautiful watch! How much did it cost you?

He—Six months in jail.

Advantages of a Moral Administration

While it is popularly supposed that the principal purpose of reform in politics is to secure an honest administration of government singularly enough the principle of economy is never observed except under a bossridden dispensation. It appears that reformers conceive that it should be sufficient that they have won public confidence and that they are believed to be free from corruption. As a consequence they usually prove to be in the nature of an expensive luxury. The bossridden administration is nearly always economical because the typical boss by whom the public policy is dictated is ever selfishly mindful of public sentiment and the importance of its conciliation. A striking example of the difference between the two brands of administration which are the inevitable alternatives in this country is to be found in the recent experience of New York. At the last session of the Legislature of New York a State budget of $37,000,000 was created. This represents a greater increase than was made by the combined Legislatures of the preceding fifteen years; that is to say, while the State budget increased less than $7,000,000 in the period between 1895 and 1908, the growth this year amounts to the splendid total of approximately $8,000,000. In the days of boss rule in New York it was deemed advisable to be able to "point with pride" to records for economy, and the "performers," whatever else they were privileged to do, were never permitted to become extravagant. Of course they were bad, practical men, and doubtless they gave away valuable franchises and created golden opportunities for vulgar capital, but the people's money they handled carefully. With the coming of Governor Hughes, the advent of the reform era, the moral tone and the cost of the government instantly appreciated. This is what always happens when reformers are vested with power under our democratic form of government. Preoccupied with the ideals of public life, assured of their own incorruptibility and concerned only for the greater good, whatever they may conceive that to be, reformers regard as of minor importance the pecuniary details of government.

Our Own Experience

The experience of New York under Governor Hughes is not unique. It is the same as was the experience of the nation under the intensely moral administration of the divine Roosevelt; and if we contrast the bossridden and reform administrations of San Francisco we shall find the same characteristic distinction. In the days of Boss Buckley the moral tone of our city government was very low and so was the tax-rate. In the Buckley era we had four years of Mayor Bartlett and four years of Mayor Pond, and we have never had an efficient executive since. During those eight years our public servants would have been thrown into a panic if it had become necessary to exceed the dollar limit. Keeping within the dollar limit they raised almost sufficient money to extinguish an old bonded debt. But in the Buckley era street railroad franchises were given away and along with a low moral tone transportation facilities were extended to what had previously been regarded as inaccessible sections of the city, causing the price of realty in the sand dunes adjacent to the park panhandle to soar until the owners, who had once considered themselves land poor, grew rich. In those degenerate days more street work was done in one year than has been done in any four years since, and yet the taxpayers of old were not required to support a ponderous and costly public works' department. It was while the moral tone was low that the transformation of Golden Gate Park was in progress, and it was in those days that the Children's Playground was laid out and beautified. Park Commissioners of Buckley's day were not noted for their public spirit, but at least they were efficient administrators. Morally, perhaps, they were not in the same class with the men who now compose the park commission, but mark the evidences of inefficiency that are to be observed under the current dispensation. Go out and hold communion with the visible forms of nature where the dark and deep blue ocean rolls, and you will find yourself knee-deep in sand on the foot-path opposite the salt water pumping station. The wire fence has broken down, and it appears to be nobody's business to see to the mending. The moral tone of the park, however, is beyond criticism.

Our Beautiful Charter

Though franchises were given away in Buckley's day, no money was stolen out of the City Treasury, for it was not until some years later that the Hon. James D. Phelan introduced the practice of hefting the sacks. The Buckley days were the mad, glad days of the iniquitous "solid nines," and unquestionably there were many features of public life that justified the lamentations of honest men. Reformers were as vociferous then as now. Scornful denunciations, imputations of dishonesty and stupidity were the chief ingredients of their speeches. It would have been as easy then as now to cull from the flowery eloquence of the Phelans and the Troys an anthology of virtuperative phrases. In the course of time the zealous Mr. Phelan was given his head, and with the kind assistance of the Hon. E. Robeson Taylor he concocted that grand catholicon, the Charter, which was guaranteed to exalt the moral tone of the community beyond the illusory dreams of poets and philosophers. It was this same charter that made the Ruef system possible, but it must be appreciated for the opportunities it afforded out of which has grown our magnificent bonded debt and the prospect of a tax-rate that will vindicate our pretensions to the very highest metropolitan rank.

The School Census Scandal

While the compilers of the city directory are rejoicing in the increase of population which justifies them in placing the figures at considerably over half a million the board of education is crestfallen at the returns of the school census marshals, which leave them ten thousand or more on the minus side of the returns of last year. Ten thousand school children make a sizeable crowd. They could hardly slip through a crack without attracting attention. The theory has been suggested that the returns last year were heavily padded, but this is hardly plausible in view of what the city directory reveals. But why should there be any doubt on the subject? It is an easy matter to examine the school registers and find out the number of pupils enrolled. As the school census is a matter of considerable importance to the taxpayers of this city owing to the fact that the State contributes to the support of the schools on the basis of the number of children, it is somewhat singular that our chief executive does not devote a little of his time to an investigation of the subject. Many scandals have arisen in this city out of the politics done in connection with the school census, and it is most unfortunate that there should be another at this time, since we are now supposed to be enjoying the advantages of a most benign administration. However we are inclined to make allowance for circumstances which in all probability make it well nigh impossible for Mayor Taylor to exact faithful service from the members of his official family. A man whose versatility enables him to draw several salaries is presumably a very busy individual, and it would be unreasonable to require him to supervise all the details of his divers spheres of action.

Something New Out of Africa

Grave historians have found rich food for pathos in the woes of dethroned emperors; light-minded chroniclers, like Dr. Doran, have playfully treated of the ups and downs of monarchs retired from business. It remains for some contemporaneous pen to record the eccentricities of a president who doesn't know he is relegated to private life. These reflections, not startling and not deep, are inspired by a remarkable dispatch that has just come out of Africa—to be exact, from the Nairobi river in British East Africa. There it is, as all the world has had facile opportunity to learn, that the strenuous Teddy is plugging the gazelle and dum-dumming the warthog, the while his strenuous son shoots the stripes off the zebra and slashes the pachyderm of the rhinoceros with his trusty bowie knife. One might think that the publicity vouchsafed by an indulgent press to the hunting adventures of our former chief executive would prove not distasteful to certain qualities which he shares with less distinguished men. But it would appear otherwise. While it would be gross exaggeration to intimate that his innate modesty has been jarred by the publication of hair-breadth escapes and tremendous slaughterings of the inoffensive mammals of the dark continent, yet is it patent that Colonel Roosevelt objects to the exploitation of his sporting adventures in the jungle. A malicious interpretation of this unwonted attitude might point to a fear of competition, on the assumption that Colonel Roosevelt is to receive some transcendent sum per word for the narrative of his adventures which he will write on his return to America. However that may be, it remains true that the strenuous ex has launched a veritable sockdolager of condensed denunciation at the luckless newspapermen who have dared to cable news of his exploits from Nairobi. These newsgatherers, says Teddy, have none but the ordinary channels for collecting information; hence many of their stories are "sheer inventions." Here is a logical non sequitur which even the uninitiate of newspaper lore will gasp at. But Teddy has more behind. The details, he gravely informs the world of waiting listeners, can only have been obtained by bribery. As the details, by his own pronunciamento, are "sheer inventions," we are evidently asked to believe that the newspapermen at Nairobi have been purchasing gold bricks, a deduction violently at outs with the known character of the men who are selected by the great news agencies for such assignments. To crown his bizarre logic, the strenuous ex concludes with what the lawyers call "dictum" to the effect that a dishonorable newspaperman giving a bribe would be willing to invent untruths for money or "traffic in other forms of dishonor." Now, we submit, with due editorial seriousness, is there not here ample justification for the suspicion that Roosevelt has been bitten by the tsetse fly and that his wits are plagued with the sleeping sickness?

Is Man's Tenderness a Myth?

Whether it be that the question of woman's suffrage is lacking in innate interest or whether its prominent expounders have decided to adopt the spectacular methods of advertisers to claim lagging attention for their propaganda, it is certain that the most vigorous of the suffragettes are today vying with college professors in the defense of startling theses. The very latest of these comes out of wonderful New Rochelle where a suffragette took the platform the other day to prove that man's tenderness to woman is a myth of masculine invention. Just what connection such a proposition as that may have with the blatantly agitated cause of female suffrage is not superficially apparent; doubtless it has some logical connection clear to the initiated. But the statement possesses interest on its own account and coming from a suffragette, merits some rumination. If man has been posing as a tender animal in his relations with the weaker sex and has in reality exhibited none of the soft amenities which the word implies, then indeed the suffragette of New Rochelle has very justifiably exposed the hypocrisy of the masculine creature. But is it true? Have history, tradition, song and story been framed by deceitful man in an age-long conspiracy to usurp a quality to which man has never been entitled? Have the relations between the sexes been a delusion and a snare? Has all the tenderness been on the woman's side? Doubtless, in disregarding the evidence of the centuries and the seeming proof of current life, the suffragette of New Rochelle has preferred her own experience to the testimony of others. It may be that she has fortified the opinion thus certified by consultation with her suffragette sisters. Then must it be supposed that these suffragettes have been the recipients of no tender attentions from man; that their lives have passed in dreary relations unsoftened by romantic courtesies. We are confronted by a dilemma. Either the suffragettes are of a personality unattractive to the stronger and more animal sex; or else their espousal of harsh and unwonted political tenets has alienated them from the sweet prerogatives of their sisters who care naught for votes and civic uplift. Does the New Rochelle suffragette convict herself while striving to indict tyrannous man?

The Shirking of Exertion

Emerson Hough, who practices what he preaches, says that what's the matter with the world is that it is all wrong. Mr. Hough, however, is not setting himself up as a universal reformer. His criticism refers only to the popular conception of a vacation—getting away from everything that savors ever so remotely of hardship. Therefore people with means fly southward as soon as there is a hint of cold weather and flit across the ocean when the summer heats begin. Mr. Hough believes that in winter people should go to the north, to the sleighing and all the winter sports and bracing frosts. One of the curious points about vacationing is that the people who laboriously do nothing all the year round are the ones who are assumed to need the change and variety. And the migrations to the West Indies, Florida and other southern resorts are in line with the modern tendency to escape from everything which appears to demand exertion. We have royal roads to health as well as to education, and often the trouble that is taken to escape from work is more exhausting than the work itself. Children in the nursery are provided with mechanical toys which are set in motion by springs and keys, and their share of the enjoyment is to sit passively and watch the thing run down. The favorite animal pets are not the frolicksome dogs and frisking kittens which lead a merry chase in the open air, but the fat pugs and toy terriers trained to sit sedately on a cushion in an automobile or to ornament an apartment. Education has degenerated into a process of going to school, in which there is much teaching by hired pedagogues and as little effort as possible on the part of pupils. Travel is luxurious. Instead of variety and change, the newest ocean liners are constructed with a view to making as little difference in the habits and customs of passengers as is consistent with conditions, and the speed with which trains and boats are run is rapidly approaching the ideal of the pneumatic tube. All the boasted improvements which the Socialistic propagandists foresee in domestic problems are in the direction of giving housekeepers less to do at home in order that they may have more time to do nothing abroad, and all the leisure which is gained is put to the same use, of laboriously doing nothing and lamenting the exertion it demands.

Perspective Impressions

Curtis Lindley, special counsel for the city under the Taylor-Spreckels dispensation, rushed into print the other day in defense of the Bar Association. What was it that Mr. Lindley said in defense of the Supreme Court and the Court of Appeal? And what did the Bar Association do when a shameless pervert of Mr. Lindley's profession hurled slander after slander at the courts of the State?

Mayor Taylor has been denouncing bossism in Los Angeles. He says that it "compels the man elected to office to do the bidding of the man who put him in the office." But when the people of San Francisco elected Mayor Taylor they believed that he was a man of such dignitty and independence that he could not be subjected to such degrading influence.

Fanatics Ancient and Modern

One Prominent Trait of Common Human Nature That Manifests Itself Perpetually in All Ages, Among all Peoples and Under Every Varying Condition of Civilization, Semi-Civilization and Rank Barbarism.

By Democritus

The Calvinists of Switzerland have erected a monument to the memory of Michael Servetus. It is an expiatory memorial by the descendants of the fanatics that burned Servetus at the stake for saying that he could not stomach the theology of Calvin. It was the fashion in those days to burn heretics and Servetus was a heretic. The Catholics were accustomed to burn Calvinists for their heresies and I suppose the Calvinists merely followed the custom of the time. Ask a latter day Presbyterian, however, what he thinks of the Catholics who used to burn Presbyterian heretics, and you will hear an answer to curdle your blood. In the opinion of a modern Presbyterian or Calvinist it was so close to the unpardonable sin to burn a Presbyterian saint, that the Recording Angel invariably entered the two crimes on the same side of his ledger. But if you ask him what he thinks of the burning of Michael Servetus he will tell you that it served the old heretic right, and that a lot more of the same sort ought to have been burned as Servetus was burned—over a slow fire.

John Calvin was a cold-blooded murderer and a canting hypocrite. He pretended to preach the gospel of Christ; and him crucified; but he was eager to crucify all who differed from him on the doctrine of the trinity or who denied the divinity of the founder of Christianity. If John Calvin had lived in Judea in the age of Tiberias he would have been a Pharisee of the Pharisees—a friend of Annas and a companion of Caiaphas. If John Calvin lived today he would vote in Berkeley and he would be a member of the Citizens' League of Justice—a friend of Professor Bunnell and a companion of Professor Boke.

Fanaticism is the same today that it was when John Calvin burned Michael Servetus at the stake. The modern fanatic, however, cannot burn his victim at the stake. He is afraid that two can play at that game. So he confines his activities to the wagging of his tongue. He utters accusations and forthwith condemns all whom he may accuse. He arises in his pulpit or upon the platform and after announcing that he and his kind are the only just men made perfect declares that all others are brands for the burning. There is no grace save in his religion or politics, and unless all men come to his way of thinking the country is doomed to destruction and the people are rushing headlong to perdition. If he had his way unhampered and untrammeled everybody would be of his way of thinking or suffer the consequences of heresy and blasphemy, which would be death in any form he might elect. The Calvinistic fanatic burned witches in Salem, cropped the ears of Quakers, put infidels in the stocks and the dungeon and made Baptists stand in the pillory to be dead-catted by the Presbyterian mob. It would be the same today if the sects and political parties were not so evenly divided. The fanatics are not united, except in politics and these are in the minority. The Good Government League of California is so weak numerically that it is compelled to select its candidates from every other party; and the Citizens' League of Justice couldn't elect a dog catcher for the Richmond District.

But after all, the twentieth century fanatic is only pestiferous; he is not dangerous. His fangs have been extracted. As a nuisance, however, he is to be execrated by all decent citizens. Take Professor Boke, for example—there is nothing intrinsically deadly in Professor Boke. He is merely a busybody going about making an ass of himself by instructing people how they should behave. Professor Boke is a harmless fanatic, but he ought to be suppressed nevertheless, for he is what our grandmothers used to call "a snoop."

Francis J. Heney is a fanatic, but of a sort different from Professor Boke. Francis J. Heney is of the heretic-burning class; and since he cannot burn Patrick Calhoun at the stake he is trying to convict him of dynamiting "Big Jim" Gallagher and robbing William J. Burns of a lot of jury reports one of which convicts Heney himself of trying to "plant" a prosecution fanatic on two juries. There is method in Heney's fanaticism, however; as the Spreckels payroll recently exposed in court testifies. Heney is well paid for his fanaticism. If Heney had prosecuted Michael Servetus he would have out-Calvined Calvin himself, and he would not have been content to merely burn the philosopher over a slow fire—he would have flayed him first and burned him afterwards. Heney at the present time is more dangerous than his friend, admirer and coadjutor, Professor Boke, because he is temporarily in possession of the power of the District Attorney. The people realize that it is dangerous to entrust this power to a fanatic of the Heney stripe, and next fall they will dispense with him. There is no place in the politics of this community for fanatics of the Heney breed. Honest fanatics may be credited with their honesty, but fanatics for hire who deny their mercenary motives will not be tolerated.

Rudolph Spreckels is a fanatic, but as he pays for his fanaticism perhaps we can let him go on paying. Eventually the money that Spreckels pays out in the effort to purchase gratification of his animosities will find its way into the channels of trade and what shall be Spreckels' loss will be the gain of the community. Spreckels ought to be encouraged to squander his money in this foolish manner. He ought to be punished, however, for usurping the power of the District Attorney to wreak his revenge on his enemies. It should be made plain to Rudolph Spreckels that he does not own this town; that he is not the master of our courts; and that he is only a Spreckels after all—a person of no more worth than any other ordinary citizen. Rudolph Spreckels ought to be made to understand that the only difference between himself and the humblest clerk in his father's grocery store, before old Claus Spreckels went into the sugar business, is about a million dollars. He should be informed in plain language that it is not Rudolph Spreckels who commands the power he is at present exercising; but the money he spends in the effort to exercise that power. Take away his money and nobody would pay the slightest attention to Rudolph Spreckels. As a matter of fact, according to his own testimony under oath he is not even a citizen of San Francisco—he has cast but one vote since he came of voting age, and that one was used to assist Dr. Edward Taylor to be Mayor of San Francisco. A single vote does not make a citizen—and a vote for Mayor Taylor can scarcely be counted as a Spreckels asset of citizenship.

I had it in mind to say something of Jimmy Phelan in this relation, but as I approach the subject I find that the little statesman is not in the fanatic class. He wouldn't burn anybody at the stake and he does all his roasting by proxy through the columns of his long leased organ the Bulletin. Phelan is a false alarm, and he has sounded himself so frequently that every body has ceased paying attention to his tocsin. If Phelan had been at the burning of Servetus he would have carried the faggots, probably, but the labor would not have been performed with any special desire to broil the man at the stake. The victim on the pile would have been merely an incident of an auspicious occasion affording excellent opportunity for James D. Phelan to make a stump speech to the crowd attracted by the bonfire.

It pleases me to hear that the Calvinists of Geneva have repented of the burning of Michael Servetus and that they are expressing their shame for the atrocious bigotry of their forefathers and atoning by this late tribute to the memory of a good and wise man, for the great wrong that the fanatics of that dark age committed upon him.

A Pen Portrait

Of a citizen now in the public eye. It was drawn two centuries ago by the master hand of Tobias Smollet.—Editor's note.

From the man whom I love though my heart I disguise,
I will freely describe the wretch I despise;
And if he has sense but to balance a straw,
He will surely take the hint from the picture I draw.

A wit without sense, without fancy a beau,
Like a parrot he chatters, and struts like a crow;
A peacock in pride, in grimace a baboon,
In courage a hind, in conceit a Gascon.

As a vulture rapacious, in falsehood a fox,
Inconstant as waves, and unfeeling as rocks;
As a tiger ferocious, perverse as a hog,
In mischief an ape, and in fawning a dog.

In a word, to sum up all his talents together,
His heart is of lead, and his brain is of feather;
Yet, if he has sense but to balance a straw,
He will surely take the hint from the picture I draw.

A HORSE BOLTING BEFORE A MONOPLANE

The monoplane has travelled at a speed of over 40 miles an hour; to be precise it has covered nine miles in 13 minutes, 23 seconds.

The Conquest of the Air

By Arthur Swan

Great is the progress that aviators are making. It was in August of last year that Count Zeppelin set sail in his dirigible balloon from Friedrichshafen for a twenty-four hour trip to Mayence and return, with the whole Fatherland and the Emperor keenly alive to the national importance of the event. Count Zeppelin had to descend at Echterdingen for repairs owing to a thunderstorm and his balloon was totally destroyed. The count's exploit was nevertheless considered remarkable. But how feeble it seems in comparison with the trip from Bitterfield to Friederichshafen and almost back again, a distance of 850 miles!

Every month promises a new "world's record" in flying. A little while ago it was held by Orville Wright. Before him it was held by Delagrange, the Frenchman. Prior to that Farman, the Scotsman, held it. The record of successful flights during the last year and a half is an impressive one. In includes the achievements of at least nine heavier-than-air machines constructed along different lines, but all of them based on the principle of the aeroplane. Farman, Lelas, the Wright Brothers, Baldwin, Delagrange, Bieriot, Curtiss, Ferber, Malecott; these are names of aviators who have figured in the newspapers as a result of their efforts with areoplanes, hydroplanes, biplanes and monoplanes, and singularly enough there has been only one serious accident recorded against those who do their flying in real flying, not floating, machines, while balloonists have suffered all sorts of mishaps.

It was on September 7, 1908, that Leon Delagrange circled the field at Issy eighteen times, remaining in the air thirty-one minutes. The average height of the flight was thirteen feet. On the day before he had broken the world's record by a flight of half an hour lacking five seconds and his greatest altitude was twenty-six feet. Then Orville Wright got busy at Fort Myer near Washington. On September 9th he made three flights and three new records. In the early morning he flew around the parade ground for 7 minutes, 31 seconds; late in the afternoon he flew for 62 minutes, 15 seconds. And in the moonlight of the same evening he took Lieutenant Lahn on the machine and the two sailed around for 6 minutes,—the record for a flight of two.

The achievement of the Wright brothers, who recently returned to their home with the acclaim of all Europe ringing in their ears, is all their own. Their rivals have had governmental encouragement and some had private fortunes. The Wrights, sons of a poor preacher, without technical training, and of scanty education, have gone ahead tinkering with flying machines and have solved a problem that baffled the world's greatest scientists and inventors. As lads they experimented elaborately with kites. As they grew up they read everything they could find on the subject of aviation. For twelve years they studied and then they began making machines. Between machines they spent months in study and all the while they experimented with air currents. By the year 1900 they had a machine that would sail but would not carry a man. In 1903 they had a machine that carried one of them 900 feet. "This was the first dynamic flying machine," it is said, "that ever raised itself by its own power with a man in it." In 1904 one of the Wrights flew a mile, and it was not until then that the brothers took the public into their confidence.

Delagrange is the most successful of the Wright brothers' rivals, and recently he abandoned his plans and ordered an aeroplane of the American model. Zeppelin, the most successful of the balloonists, is confident that the gas-bag is the only reliable medium of aerial navigation, and in view of his recent exploit it must be admitted that he has good reason for his faith. And doubtless his latest success will again fill Europe with anxiety. The feverish desire of the Europeans to make the most of whatever military advantages there may be in the perfection of aerial transportation is almost tragic. When Zeppelin made his first big trip last year the emotional effect on the people of Germany was astonishing. Some laughed wildly and apparently without control; others raised their voices in ineffectual cries of encouragement; others wept and other gazed mutely at the apparition in the air. When Zeppelin came to grief the news was received like that of a great national disaster and people wept as unaffectedly as if the German army had lost an important battle. In a few days more than half a million dollars was subscribed by the Government and the people to enable the count to continue his efforts for the conquest of the air. It was just three days after that mishap that Wilbur Wright filled all France with delight by making a flight of a mile and a half. For France had obtained an option on his machine, and Frenchmen believed that in the aeroplane lies her hope of effectively meeting Germany's dirigibles in the war of the future.

The Lavender Wedlock

From the German of Otto Julius Bierbaum

She was a slender little woman with sky blue eyes, a soft voice that quavered, ashen hair which she parted in the middle and combed smoothly over her temples. She was typically Teutonic of feature, a spirituelle creature, tender and clinging.

Her most wonderful mannerism was the way she had of opening her eyes—it bespoke a prayer to Heaven punctuated with a thousand silent ejaculations of humility. Her grandfather had summed up her character with accurate aptness. "Dear, little, stupid violet," was the term by which he addressed her until her fifteenth year; then he called her "Mlle. Violette," and finally "Mme. La Violette" when she had been married —for she herself would never have dared to marry the "young master," whom she adored, whom others admired and to whom the whole world was listening attentively.

She scarcely realized how it had happened. Like a message of grace from Heaven it had come over her when one evening he asked her to be his wife. For answer she had cried and run out of the room into the kitchen, and there had embraced the corpulent maid, sobbing for happiness.

He had asked for her hand, and her father had found no objections, for his daughter adored this great artist.

There was scarcely need to wait for her consent. Long before she knew him personally she had raved about him and had played his compositions to the exclusion of all other composers. She had gazed long at his picture which appeared on the title-page, the portrait of a man from the southlands, with crisp black curls falling over his forehead, sharply curved nose, full lips and dark, glowing eyes.

Now she had become his wife; but she could scarcely accustom herself to this new station. Even on the wedding day she glanced up at him reverently, her eyes filled with the devotion of a nun.

"How wags the world with Mme. La Violette?" asked her grandfather at the wedding dinner, catching her alone for an instant.

"Oh, grandfather!" And again she wept scalding tears.

"But Violet! My dear, little, stupid violet, be sensible! You know now you are Mme. La Violette and you must realize your position. Take yourself in hand and be brave! What is the matter? You love him, do you not?"

"Oh, tremendously!"

"Very well, then; cheer up, my violet. Don't be tearful, but take some part in the conversation. You must not spend all your time simply gazing at him. Don't shrink so, but blossom on his breast."

And then the big, dark, commanding man with the eyes of genius interrupted them.

"The little violet is still timid," pleaded her grandfather. And the genius nodded dreamily.

But in her heart echoed her grandfather's words: "Blossom on his breast!"

That she would do, embracing him tenderly like ivy clinging to the statue of a god.

At first this adoration delighted him. With silent steps his love paced the house, strewing flowers about the sacrificial altar of her god. His fount of musical creation was loosed. Every chord was rewarded with a grateful glance, every ebullition of sentiment with tender surrender. It was a journey among fragrant jasmine boughs, a clear sky overhead and balmy moss underfoot.

From out of a swaying cloud of soft tenderness he threw his harmonies to the world. And her heart was full of bliss and adoration. Her glance was directed above and she hoped to spend her whole life in an attitude of supplication.

When the symphony was completed his friends heard the work. "Far too tender, dear friend. Where is your rousing swing? What has become of your palette of tonal colors that so stirred the heart? You are degenerating into saccharine prettiness."

Everywhere the judgment was the same: "Where is the old strength? Passion is your forte. You are not composing for sentimental singing societies, so take yourself in hand, else you will turn Philistine."

And in truth this tender and perfumed music did not come from his real musical self. It was only the expression of an idyllic episode; the old spirit of daring was not in it. Then his soul began once more to be stirred by echoes of his former boldness. He banished the growing lassitude and roused himself to pursue his wild, tempestuous fantasies.

But always at his back was the rustling sound of someone hovering near.

"Rose, I beg of you, leave off your languishing ways. Don't steal about so—and this eternal gazing of yours makes me very nervous."

"Robert!"

"Please understand me: I cannot bear this everlasting tenderness. We will simply expire of love and ennui."

She started, lashed by the brutality of his words, and for the first time a look of pain appeared in her eyes.

"Do you ever glow with passion? This continual melting is unbearable!"

He stormed himself out at the piano while she sat in a corner, listening. Then he slammed down the lid of the instrument and left the room withou an adieu.

Fear clamored at her heart. The mighty chords she had heard tore her soul. But everything else disappeared when she recalled the genius of this great man.

"Blossom on his breast! Can I do more?"

He returned late, looking disheveled.

"Robert!"

"Leave me alone!"

That night she did not sleep, torn by the tortures of despair. But the next day she began again her silent adoration. The more he revealed in the innermost passion which he voiced in rushing harmonies, the more she realized his greatness, his artistic manhood, and all the more she clung to him in silent, patient adoration.

He strayed farther and farther from her, until finally the thought of her was as a sickening incense about him.

Several times he tried in vain to awaken her. Then he forbade her to enter his room while he played and composed. And when he grew tired of working he sought relief and relaxation—no one knew where.

She sensed the fact that his love was passing, but she was so blinded by adoration that she could not find a way to win him back. She had been created only to bloom silently at his breast, like ivy about the statue of a god. And he—he craved a woman instead of a flower.

"Is Mme. La Violette happy?" asked her grandfather.

"Happy? Oh, tremendously so, grandfather!"

Saving Their Good Name

San Francisco is to have a restaurant built on the old-fashioned Poodle Dog plan so dear to the hearts of ante-calamity night livers, which, in addition to portals that swallow automobiles and closed carriages as Chronos swallowed his children, will have an elevator into which the automobile or the carriage may be driven and lifted to the place of destination. Some phases of the night life of San Francisco require these precautions. In this city the ascent to Avernus has always been easy, and there was really no shrieking necessity for the automobile elevator; but every "improvement" that will facilitate the wickedness of the town is welcome. And there need be no fear on the part of the French restaurant keepers that they will ever again be compelled to submit to the extortion that was practiced on them by Ruef and Schmitz. As long as Rudolph Spreckels and his League of Justice are able and willing to prosecute those who show a disposition to prey on the rotisseries au discretion, this kind of vice will be "a feature of life in San Francisco." I hope for the sake of scores of unsullied reputations now masquerading in our best society, that all the apartments of these "hotels de diable" will be on the rear elevation of the building. It is not desirable that there shall be a repetition of the three-storied expose that ensued upon the occasion of our last great earthquake when the front walls of Delmonico's fell outward, revealing the secrets of that house of joy and forbidden mirth. I am well aware that as lightning never strikes again in the same place, so earthquakes never occur precisely at the same hour of the early morning. Still, as a wise precaution I would suggest that the apartments of these new French restaurants be arranged as "inside rooms." The patrons of the restaurants will rest easier if they know that they will be safe from scandalous observation even though the heavens fall. It is not the mighty earthquake that the night livers of San Francisco fear so much as to awake from happy dreams to find their names in the newspapers and their reputations the jeer and the jest of all the clubs.

Doubtful Authors

A writer in the Call recently took George Wharton James to task because he did not mention in the list of those Californian "novelists" whom he intends to review in a forthcoming lecture on California literature, those eminent fictionists, Gelett Burgess and Will Irwin. I wish the writer in the Call had named some of the novels written by Burgess and Irwin—my own recollection is to the effect that these Californian literateurs have not yet written anything that could be dignified as a novel. I may be mistaken or maybe I don't know a novel when I read it; anyway I am of the opinion that Professor James was justified in omitting Burgess and Irwin from his list of Californian novelists—they may be Californians, but their work is not of that cult; they are exotic dilletante and could not catch the real Californian flavor in their work however hard they might try—they are merely journalistic stars in the literary firmament of New York. I observe, too, that the Call writer rebukes Professor James for not including "in the category of our famous authors so well known a literary person as Professor Henry Morse Stephens." This is certainly exclusive information and a clean scoop for the Call. I have heard that it is the intention of Professor Stephens, who is an Englishman and not at all a Californian, to write some historical Californian literature, but as his great work on the earthquake of 1906 is still in process of composition, he can scarcely be placed at this time in the "category of our famous authors." I wish the writers on the Call would give up writing for publication and go back to their several vocations in commerce, industry and school teaching.

Candidates for Portola

I am still for Ed Hamilton in the role of Gaspar de Portola. I still contend that in everything that could be devised to remind us of that ancient hero, Hamilton is ready to the hand of the make-up artist, and that in addition he possesses native talents and a presence admirably fitting him for the part. Other candidates have been offered by my esteemed feminine contemporary, Miss Fraser of the Examiner, but none of them would fill the bill like Hamilton, who is almost a replica of Don Gaspar in his own person and without extraneous accessories. Imagine Willis Polk, or Joe Redding, or Walter Hobart, or Dick Hotaling in the masquerade, as suggested by Miss Fraser! Ludicrous! Incongruous! Impossible! If we can't have Hamilton let us have Ned Greenway as was originally proposed. Better a fat and frivolous Portola than any of these who might disguise themselves as they will in cuirass, jerkin, headpiece and wide spreading mustaches and deceive nobody. Miss Fraser's candidates are too obviously just what they are. But Ned Hamilton would be anything we would have him, and he would certainly act the part better than Don Gaspar himself if he could revisit the glimpses of that October moon.

How They Do Things in Los Angeles

Beyond our city limits there is no man that takes a deeper interest in our affairs than Mr. E. T. Earl, the proprietor of the Express, who grew rich by taking advantage of rebates while shipping fruit, and who then turned moralist for the civic welfare. Mr. Earl is probably the most pious patriot in the Lincoln-Roosevelt League. He is unquestionably the most enthusiastic of the out-of-town boosters of our little, indestructibe band of regenerators. A regenerator himself, Mr. Earl recently led a crusade against the grafters of Los Angeles and he drove them out of office. Once again Los Angeles is pure, and again, the uproar having subsided, the community is enjoying moral peace and quiet. You don't hear anything nowadays about corruption in Los Angeles. The city is as clean as a whistle and as free from scandal as from personal abuse. The uproar didn't last more than a few weeks. As soon as the regenerators exterminated the grafting officials clamor faded away and the voice of the real estate promoter could be heard in the land. "That's the way we do things in Los Angeles," said a distinguished resident of that city to me the other day. He beamed upon me with pride. "How did you do it?" I asked. "Earl did it" he said. "As soon as we got rid of the crooks Earl called a halt. "None of this San Francisco business," said Mr. Earl. He didn't want any long-drawn-out prosecutions. The people of Los Angeles, he knew, wouldn't stand for muckraking in the magazines. So Mayor Harper was banished and that was the end of it. Nothing like a quick finish." And the man from Los Angeles beamed again. He was bubbling over with self-satisfaction.

Dividend of the Strap

The Examiner prints the famous remark of Charles T. Yerkes: "It's the straphangers that pay dividends," as part of its argument in favor of a municipal street railroad. Furthermore it says that if the people want new lines they must build them themselves, and that if they want more cars and better treatment they must secure them by putting their own money into the enterprise. That will be an ideal condition—new lines, more cars and no straphangers. The new lines are probable in the event that the city shall operate its own street railroads; but I doubt the fulfillment of the promise of more cars and I am sure that as long as passengers ride and cars run there will be straphangers. We can have all the "new lines" we are willing to pay for; we can run as many cars as the tracks will accommodate or as may be demanded by the traffic; but no matter how many new lines we operate or how many cars we put on, the straphanger will still insist upon hanging—unless, of course it is the intention of the Examiner to close the gates of the cars when all the seats are occupied; and I can imagine the roar that will arise from the five o'clock multitude as the cars go by displaying the sign, "All full." I can also see the finish of the Examiner's municipal railroad. Yerkes was right: "It's the straphangers that pay dividends"; and they will be as necessary in defraying the expense of operating a municipal railroad as they are in providing dividends for a private corporation. It seems to me that the Examiner is sometimes more foolish in its utterances than at others. And this is one of those times when it is unusually foolish or when it imagines that its readers are unusually receptive to its foolishness.

The Lawyer and the Hen

It has been said that the hen clucks and broods her chickens unconscious that to the end of the world she is part and parcel of a revelation of God to man. This is quite true. The hen is an awfully stupid creature. She can't differentiate a genuine egg from a door knob. Mr. Samuel M. Shortridge who has been studying the hen in connection with the practice of husbandry at his home in Menlo has discovered that this humble partner of the rooster's joys is entirely destitute of even the essential instincts of her profession. The discovery was made quite accidentally. Strolling through the poultry section of his amateur but model farm the other day Mr. Shortridge, to employ his own language, "encountered a hen that manifested a disposition to set." Believing that the disposition of a simple fowl should always be indulged Mr. Shortridge, recalling that he had shortly before seen some eggs in the pantry, made haste thither, selected twelve and hastened back to the poultry yard where he completed arrangements with the clucking hen. His labors over he threw himself in a hammock and meditated on the joys of a bucolic existence until roused by the cook who had missed the eggs from the pantry. They were hard-boiled eggs he said. Mr. Shortridge did not want to hear him say anything more.

life than is to be found in this democratic republic. In Mexico the Government supports the theatre and in the new budget there is an appropriation of $3,000,000 for a new theatre and $1,000,000 for a monument to commemorate the 100th anniversary of national independence. But there seems to be a singular indifference to the possibility of becoming engaged in barbaric conflict with other nations. Neither the army nor navy is calling for huge sums. In Rio de Janeiro the people are similarly benighted. They are not thinking of war but the Government has just completed a beautiful theatre at a cost of $5,000,000, the picture of which is here printed.

A Labor Leader's Opinion of Labor

One of the labor leaders who sat in the recent secret conference which selected a ticket for the union labor voters, was standing the other night in front of the Labor Temple on Guerrero street. H. was any different now from what he was two years ago?" queried a workingman, but a serious work dealing with military strategy and tactics. General Adna R. Chaffee has commended it for its technical excellencies, going so far as to say that it is the best work on military strategy which has come under his observation for years. When the "Vermilion Pencil" came out, somewhat less than two years ago, one critic queried whether the writer could fight as well as he could write, in which case the Chinese army had made in him a real find. Homer Lea is one of the many Stanford men who does not hold a diploma of graduation, and he appears to be in good company. His somewhat bombastical title of Lieutenant General of the Chinese Army of Reform is not all on paper, for such was his importance as a leader and fighter that the late empress put a heavy price on his head.

Ade in Reminiscent Mood

George Ade has been in San Francisco so many times that he is prepared for anything, but on his first visit many years ago he had an experience that startled him. He arrived from Chicago in a special car along with other newspapermen and many cases of champagne. When he landed at the foot of Market street he took a cab and proceeded up the street to the Palace Hotel, and later, standing on the sidewalk, he noticed a large crowd in front of the Chronicle building. A bystander told him the people were watching the bulletins of a prize-fight and he joined the throng. "While I stood gazing at the bulletins," he says, describing his first night in San Francisco, "the Chronicle building darted up the street sidewise. The scenery both sides of the thoroughfare seemed to be playing tag. I almost fell on my face. The ground seemed to be dancing under me. When I recovered the perpendicular my eyes were filled with tears. I fled for the Palace Hotel. My dreadful misgivings touching the champagne returned and I went to my room. There I cast myself groaning on a lounge and sent for a physician. The medicine man went all over me and at the end looked baffled. 'A little feverish,' he said, 'but nothing to count. What stampeded you?' I related the upheaval of all things earthly in front of the Chronicle. I told him how things had gone round and round and how the buildings had chased each other up the street. 'Why, he exclaimed in disgust, 'you were standing on a turn-table.' That was all. They had merely run a big street car in behind me and were turning me around. I was suffering not from an overdose of champagne but from a sudden attack of turn-table."

The Genesis of a Humorist

Though George Ade is one of the authors popularly believe to have achieved results without effort experience has taught him, he says, that hard systematic work is a pretty good substitute for inspiration. His early ambition to "do something" was inspired in a curious way. His father was a prosperous farmer in Kentland, Indiana, the first man in the district to acquire the luxury of a two-seated covered carriage which became the pride of the village and brought its owner no little dis-

University George Ade found before him the usual choice of a college graduate of his time—law or journalism. He promptly chose law, but neither himself nor any one else knew why, and after drowsing over Blackstone for six weeks he accepted the position of city editor on a journal which enjoyed but a brief existence. His next employment was on an afternoon daily at the remunerative salary of six dollars a week, but a little calculation convinced him that at the rate living expenses overlaped receipts there were small prospects of independence. His next occupation was as press agent for a patent medicine business. The remedy was one guaranteed to cure the tobacco habit. Ade's chief duty was to edit the testimonials of those cured of the vicious habit. Some years later, in Chicago, he was employed as a special writer to do World's Fair Stories. When the fair closed he was made responsible for a department of "Stories of the Street," which called for two columns a day, from twelve hundred to two thousand words. The "stories" appeared alongside of Eugene Field's "Harps and Flats," and when Field died Ade was given his desk. "I used to get desperate for ideas," he says. "One lucky day I wrote a story on a church entertainment in which Artie was the spokesman. That was in 1895. I heard from that story so much that Artie was given a show once a week. In 1898 I ran up against the fable of the old serio-comic form. I had learned from writing my department that all people, and especially women, are more or less fond of parlor slang. In cold blood I began writing the fables to make my department go, but I had no idea that those fantastic things would catch on as they did." Of all his plays, Mr. Ade himself prefers "The Sho Gun," though it has not been anything like as good a money maker as "The College Widow" or "The Sultan of Sulu," but writing plays, according to the author, is in the same category with handling dynamite, but fables are easily concocted after the following recipe: "Take one portion Homely Truth, one portion Story, a pinch of Satire and a cupful of Capital Letters. Spice with Up-to-Date Slang if you can get it fresh, garnish with woodcut drawings and serve hot." "The College Widow" was actually written in three weeks, but it was in mind for a book at first and had been mulled over for eight years before it was put into words. "The Shogun" was so battered and maltreated before it reached the footlights that Ade determined to forsake comic opera for good and all and confine himself to farce and comedy. He has an original way of getting names for his characters. Old tax and subscription lists are his treasure trove. All the names in "The County Chairman" were selected from an ancient tax list of Vicksburg.

The Leader's Remarkable Tip

More than a year ago my sagacious contemporary The Leader took occasion to account for the deep interest which the Hon. Rudolph Spreckels had begun to take in politics and in public affairs generally. It was asserted in elucidation of the phenomenon that the seal of the young millionaire who had previously concerned himself so little with civic matters that he had never taken the trouble to vote at an election, was motived entirely in personal considerations. It was explained that he had something more than an instinctive prescience of the impending family quarrel over his father's fortune, and that he deemed it advisable to maneuver himself into a strategic position in preparation for the contest. It was pointed out that as a political boss in control of all the machinery of government, with judges on his staff, with the police at his beck and call, with the jury system under his thumb, he would have his brothers at a prodigious disadvantage. At that time I thought that my shrewd contemporary was sportively indulging in the arabesques of hypothesis, but recent developments have caused me to take another view of the matter. In the light of the present situation one might be justified in believing that the editor of The Leader is gifted with prevision. At any rate it must be acknowledged that he adumbrated coming events with remarkable accuracy. The contest is on. The Hon. Rudolph Spreckels occupies a very strong position. It could be improved only by the elevation of Lawlor and Dunne to a higher court. And that is a consummation not beyond the hopes of the gallant young millionaire. Keep your eye on the contest.

Pioche's Picture

At a recent exhibition of etchings in New York, a correspondent writes me, there was much comment on a picture of San Francisco by Meryon. Connoisseurs were inclined to doubt that it was genuine so utterly lacking was it in that mystic, poetic glamour which was characteristic of Meryon's street scenes. The picture, however, is a genuine Meryon, but the singular fact is that the artist never saw this city. The picture was made in 1855 to the order of Pioche, the banker, who was identified with much of the romantic history of early California and after whom was named a red rock quarry that was for many years a landmark of the Mission. Pioche was a cultured Frenchman, and he was also an energetic captain of industry. He built the first steam car line that was operated on this peninsula. When he made up his mind that he wanted a picture of the city, there was no local artist to whom he would entrust the work. Some of his foreign friends told him of a man that was wandering up and down Paris, catching with his etcher's art the very life and soul of the old city. It was such a man Pioche wanted.

A Puzzle Picture

It was before the days of the photograph, but he corralled a daguerreotypist, and set him out on the hills to take views of the city. He could only take it in sections, and under the very best light conditions. Sometimes the eastern slope of a hill could be seen to the best advantage in the morning, while the western side was still in deep shadow. He finally achieved five plates, which were sent to Paris. When Meryon tried to piece the sections of the city together he found that some of the shadows pointed to the east, while others extended just as definitely to the west. Streets would not fit into streets. Houses that had been cut in two would not fuse again. Large surfaces were so blurred that their reconstruction was a matter of conjecture. The artist pored over the medley of lights and shadows until, whether he waked or slept, he saw nothing else. Often it seemed to him that he must clasp both hands around his head to keep it from bursting. It meant much money to him if he could succeed, for the banker with early San Franciscan munificence had promised him the sum of $250 for his work. This was at a time when he was glad to sell his most exquisite etchings for the price of a square meal. Not only that, but in his pitiably nervous state, his health undermined by want and disappointment, he had thrown himself into his task with an interest that grew to frenzy. When the plate was ready for its bath of acid it seemed to him almost a matter of life and death. The proof came out to his satisfaction, but the strain had been too great. He never did any work again, and not long afterwards he was taken to an asylum in Paris. Pioche and Bayerque had about a hundred impressions taken of the plate and presented them to their friends. Many copies existed before the fire and were cherished mementoes of a time when cows wandered over the site of the Fairmont Hotel and Nob Hill was covered with tiny, steep-gabled houses of wood. The daguerrotype plates were in the Academy of Sciences in Market street, but were lost in the fire.

"It was simply a question of veracity between us," said the oldest inhabitant. "He said I was a liar and I said he was a liar."

"Huh!" rejoined the village postmaster. "That's the first time I ever heard of either of you telling the truth."

Tortured and Neglected

Mr. Filson Young, now visiting us, does not agree with Mr. William Watson who charges England with responsibility for the death of that sensitive poet John Davidson. Mr. Young was an intimate friend of Davidson's and within recent years spent whole days in companionship with him and saw "to what gloomy bourne he was travelling." According to Mr. Young it is the reviewers and literary men of England, not the English people who are responsible for the death of Davidson. Mr. Young says: "I have read the chief reviews of John Davidson's books written in the last few years, and often burned with shame to read them. The attempts to belittle what was at any rate serious and big, the despicable sneers of the reviewer earning his fifteen hundred a year by being funny at the expense of a poet who chose to live on £150 a year for the sake of saying only the thing he really meant; the silences, the wilful fastening upon detail and ignoring of principle—the thousand ways in which an unconscientious reviewer can wound and hurt a sensitive artist—these are what sent John Davidson to his death, whether he knew it or not. He did not mind adverse criticism; he expected disagreement, he welcomed serious attack and controversy; but the thing that got under his armour and broke his spirit was just this conspiracy to ignore, this innate hatred of the comfortable man for the uncomfortable, this dishonest practice of giving expression to a personal preference in the terms of serious criticism. I know men today, earning comfortable incomes, who control the reviewing of books on one or more papers, and who seriously profess and pretend to be concerned with maintaining literary standards, who are really engaged in nothing better than a petty personal conspiracy: who try to ignore or to damn the books of men who have offended them or their friends, and to boom the books of those who have pleased them. This is dishonest. Personal likes and dislikes are very real and respectable things; but to indulge them anonymously under the cover of artistic criticism (which has nothing to do with personal likes and dislikes) is a cowardly and base thing. It is damaging to everyone concerned. It bewilders and corrupts the public, it degrades those who do it, and it wounds and damages, more than most people understand, the artist who is really trying."

A Fatal Conspiracy of Silence

Continuing Mr. Young says: "I hold every man responsible who, having in his control the reviewing of contemporary books, and possessing enough education and discernment to discriminate between real and imitation literature, failed to see that Davidson was treated with the attention and respect to which his high talents and loftiness of aim entitled him. This conspiracy of silence was a very real thing. Last year, seeing how the man was starving for recognition, and in the silence of more competent men, I wrote a long review article attempting to give some account and estimate of his work as a whole; and I experienced the greatest difficulty in getting it published—not, if you please, on account of the inadequacy of the treatment, but (as I was assured), on account of the subject. It is one of the many things to the credit of Mr. W. L. Courtney's editorial conduct that he took that article and printed it in the "Fortnightly Review," and so secured for Davidson what he pathetically described as "the most generous gift that had ever been made to him." He was as brave as a man could be. In one of our long talks, sitting at Penzance in front of the lazy waves, he once told me that no man could be unhappy who could write blank verse; and that to write blank verse was the sheerest, most intoxicating joy that he could conceive. We used to laugh a great deal together on those meetings, which he treated as holidays from the dull round of an exile's life. Sometimes he made the pilgrimage to me at the Lizard, oftener I to him at Penzance, which was, compared with my solitude, a metropolis; and we would walk and talk, or sit and be silent together, as the humor took us. Deep underneath the surface lay bitterness and misery; on the top was this pleasure in conversation, in congenial company, in laughter and momentary forgetting. He talked wonderfully sometimes, with a sombre passion, as of a man who lived in Hell. But remember how he lived: things that are commonplace necessities to most of us who earn even a living were rare luxuries for him. The theatre, the purchase of books, were beyond him; his way of life was what I have described; the one amusement within his reach was—a walk in a country that he grew to hate! He loved conviviality; if he had been less proud and less brave he might have taken to drink—a real temptation to men of his race and class and temperament. But even that solace he latterly put utterly away from him, and on the rare visits of myself or some other of the few friends he saw, a bottle of wine.

The Truth From His Own Pen

According to Mr. Young the truth about Davidson was written by the poet himself in the epilogue to his last "Testament" written one year before his death. Here is the truth:

I felt the world a-spinning on its nave,
I felt it sheering blindly round the sun;
I felt the time had come to find a grave:
I knew it in my heart my work was done.
I took my staff in hand; I took the road
And wandered out to find my last abode.
Hearts of gold and hearts of lead,
Sing it yet in sun and rain,
'Heel and toe from dawn to dusk,
Round the world and home again,' . . .

My feet are heavy now, but on I go,
My head erect beneath the tragic years;
The way is steep, but I would have it so,
And dusty, but I lay the dust with tears,
Though none may see me weep: alone I climb
The rocky path that leads me out of time—
Out of time and out of all,
Singing yet in sun and rain
'Heel and toe from dawn to dusk,
Round the world and home again.'

Farewell the hope that mocked, farewell despair
That went before me still and made the pace.
The earth is full of graves, and mine was there
Before my life began, my resting-place;
And I shall find it out, and with the dead
Lie down forever, all my sayings said,
Deeds all done, songs all sung,
While others chant in sun and rain,
'Heel and toe from dawn to dusk,
Round the world and home again.'"

The Poet Surrendered to the Old Guard

An amusing contretemps occurred at the banquet given in honor of Raphael Weill by the Bohemian Club. It was amusing to everybody but Mayor Taylor who was obviously much annoyed. One of the features of the entertainment was "the old guard" under the command of Dr. Rucker in the role of Napoleon. The entrance of the guard was to have been made at the announcement of the toastmaster, Justice Harry Melvin. It had been arranged privately that he should give the cue, but Mayor Taylor, who knew nothing about this arrangement, in the midst of his address made an allusion to the veteran members of the club, designating them as "the old guard." The words were heard in the adjoining room, where the members of the guard in fantastic costume were listening for the cue, and promptly they began singing the "Marseillaise" and marched into the banquet room, cutting short the Mayor's felicitous remarks. Now there isn't anybody that has so keen an appreciation of the Mayor's poetic sentiments as the Mayor himself, and consequently the suppression of him in the midst of his utterances must have been as painful to him as it was embarrassing to his friend Mr. Weill. The speech as far as it went was of a very happy nature; much happier than the usual Taylor address, for the aged poet is much given to prosing these days and to the refurbishing of threadbare platitudes, but at the Weill banquet he gave promise of saying something worth while. What it was we shall probably never know, as doubtless the Mayor has forgotten.

A Miracle Picture

After some weeks of delicate negotiation the directors of the Swedish building and exhibitions at the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition have succeeded in gaing from Dr. W. L. Wright of Washington City the privilege of exhibiting Henry Hammond Ahl's painting, "The Shadow of the Cross." This is the picture which has caused such wide spread discussion among artists, chem-isis and clericals, none of whom has as yet discovered a solution to the peculiar effect which has caused the painting to be known as the "miracle picture." It is a presentation of the Crucifixion, begun by the artist at the request of a friend who is a lecturer on biblical subjects. At first Ahl was unable to conceive a satisfactory composition, but receiving a sudden inspiration, he set to work on the theme with no other idea than that of pleasing his friend and producing a good piece of work. When it was nearly finished he had occasion to go to his studio at night, and then discovered the so-called miracle. A strange light emanated from the unfinished picture. The shadowy form of the Christ stood against a background of changing light and a magnificent aura surrounded the head, while athwart the whole was cast the shadow of the cross. In ordinary daylight none of these effects is noticeable. Artists have examined the picture from every point of optics and perspective, and chemists have analyzed the pigments with the expectation of discovering some peculiarity in the materials, but nothing has been discovered. "The Shadow of the Cross" has been exhibited in different parts of the country for the benefit of religious organizations, so it is dependent on neither concealed mechanism nor special environment. Clergymen have discussed it with the effect of producing much heat while shedding no light, and unless one is prepared to accept it solely and simply as a miracle, it is as weird and uncanny as that tale of the late Frank R. Stockton, in which he had an artist produce landscapes which would vary with the season, passing through the stages of winter snow and summer heat, spring freshness and autumnal decay.

According to Marsden Manson nature fakers and financial schemers have formed an alliance to prevent San Francisco from getting water from Hetch Hetchy. Mr. Marsden Manson, it should be explained, is the engineer who expects to have the job of building the water works, the same Mr. Manson who had charge of the construction of the Marysville sewer system.

The Promotion of Unity

The California Promotion Committe is utilizing every effective means of bringing the people of all parts of the State into desirable unity and co-operation. In furtherance of this purpose are the luncheons given by the reception committee. Recently the committee entertained a delegation from the Sacramento Valley Development Association composed of officers and representatives of the commercial bodies of the eleven counties included in the association. The following week the committee was host to a dozen delegates from the North of Bay Counties Association, representing Marin, Sonoma, Napa, Mendocino and Lake counties. These men also were officials of various organizations in the several counties affiliated with the district association. In the same manner other bodies of men who are devoting their energies to the upbuilding of their communities will be invited to the luncheons of the reception committee. At the two meetings already held the up-country visitors were each called upon to tell in three-minute talks how the committee might still further co-operate with them in their work for the advancement of their section. In this way the business men of San Francisco composing the reception committee were apprised of the needs of the interior, and the close relationship and mutual interests of the metropolis and back country were emphasized. Following up these remarks the speakers were asked to put in writing the points covered in their talks, and it is now planned to appoint a committee to carry forward to definite results the propositions submitted in these communications. All are agreed that in merely bringing together these two elements that play so powerful a part in the development of the State the business men of the city and the business men of the interior the meetings are worth while, but in addition they make possible the achievement of tangible results.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks: Steel common and Coppers have been market features. Railway securities while firm have displayed inactivity, the reason being that bankers have done no aggressive buying. Their apathy has been due to the uncertainty of crops. These securities should become a factor, however, by the middle of the month. The buying of Steel has been by people who have made it an issue in its speculative career.

Wheat: The May deal in wheat is a thing of the past. The bull leader demonstrated to the satisfaction of everybody, except the bears and pessimists, that there was no corner, no undue manipulation of this market, and that the entire speculative transaction in May wheat was within bounds and at a reasonable discount under cash wheat prices. The mills are taking the wheat at all centers in this country at much over the May prices in most cases. Leaving the Northwest stocks out of consideration, the whole country has about 7,000,000 wheat in the visible supply, and further decrease in sight. Northwest stocks are decreasing fast. Now, that the May price is eliminated the trade will begin to look at the wide difference between cash wheat and at the level at which the new crop months are being sold short. The fine crop prospects in the Northwest and a lot of scenery talk all week, from the winter wheat states are causing considerable of a bear fight at this time. There is no chance for much new wheat coming to this market in July. All sales made in the pit for all months now are really short transactions. European crops are not getting the amount of rain they need. The new crop in Argentina is threatened by drought. Only a portion of the wheat brought here from Duluth was delivered on May contract, the balance going direct to mills. Latest reports from Kansas indicates yields of about 10 bushels per acre for some of the best counties. Inglis is sending some bad reports from both Southern Illinois and Northern Indiana. We believe there will be a big demand for the first offering of new wheat. Farmers will be in no hurry to sell and interior mills will take what they have to offer. The end of the May contracts will in no way affect the strong commercial position of wheat, and it looks as if the buyers of the discounted months on the soft spots will be in line for the profits.

Cotton: While the close last week was marked by sensational reports of crop disaster and predictions for a crop in some instances as small as 10½ million bales, this week went out with the preponderance of sentiment bearish and the rings were deluged with cotton for sale on the theory that material relief had come to Texas and that the forthcoming Government Report would prove a great surprise to those who counted upon a sensationally low condition report and that with good weather from now on another bumper crop would yet be made. That the crop could so completely recover from all unfavorableness in one week is miraculous and all precedents are set at naught. Recent rains in Texas have no doubt done a great deal of good inasmuch as it will now be possible to prepare lands that have been too dry to plow since last September, and the higher prices for Cotton will no doubt prove an incentive for the farmer in these sections to try to make a crop, but he will not be able to get the plant to the bolling stage in time to defeat the ravages of the boll-weevil and it is doubtful if the plant can acquire sufficient vitality to survive the sweltering weather of July and August. It is now the first of June when cotton should be bolling all over Texas. Last year new bales were reported in Texas as early as June 20th, whereas this year very little of it is up. The plant is quite small, and as far south as Cuero some planting still remains to be done. Reports from our correspondents throughout the south under date of May 20th are as follows:

Pulaski, Tenn.—There is about 6 per cent decrease in cotton acreage. Storms and floods have put the crop about 10 days late. Weather has also been unfavorable on account of coolness.

Fort Smith, Ark.—From best information obtainable the acreage is about 4 per cent less than last year. Temperature has averaged about 40 degrees below last year and rainfall is excessive. The plant is often yellow and sickly.

Natchez, Miss.—The crop in Mississippi is about ten days late. On account of cold weather and excessive rains, the plant is quite small and very little cultivation has been done. Average decrease in acreage 35 per cent.

Montgomery, Ala.—Plant small and correspondents claim crop late. In some sections too much rain has fallen. Acreage estimated 3 per cent less than last year.

Oklahoma City, Akla.—Conditions are better than the average as spring weather has been very favorable. Crop about 10 days earlier than last year. Acreage decrease about 15 per cent.

New Orleans, La.—Crop is about 10 days late account of cold and wet weather, much replanting has been found necessary. In the boll-weevil districts, which now embrace all of the State west of the Mississippi River, decrease in acreage will average 25 to 30 per cent.

Houston, Tex.—In South Texas there has been a reduction in cotton acreage of about 15 per cent. Crop fully 30 days late and all not planted. Ordinarily at this season of the year cotton is in bloom as far north as Houston. Despite cold winter and late spring, boll-weevils as numerous as ever. Government experts figure 8 per cent of those in captivity at Experimental Station survived the winter which is high. Two boll-weevils in June mean millions before frost.

Dallas, Tex.—Acreage about same as last year. Farmers waited until last moment on account dry weather. Rains of May 18th will probably decide many. Cotton all way from four to six weeks late; growth badly retarded account dry weather. Some just up and that which is up not doing well. Precipitation of May 18th not heavy, and more needed.

Augusta, Ga.—Acreage decreased about 2 per cent. With a few local exceptions conditions over the State are good.

Fayetteville, N. C.—Acreage unchanged. Crop early though cool nights and dry weather have retarded growth some.

Newberry, S. C.—Acreage 2 per cent less than last year, and conditions much the same. Stands generally good and soil in fine condition. Cool nights have been the principal drawback.

Kennett, Mo.—Dunkin County which grows 60 per cent of crop of Missouri about same as last year, when crop was 31,000 bales.

In our opinion the rise in prices so far taken place has really discounted nothing in the future but merely represents a rebound from the depression incident to rapid marketing of the crop last fall in a market with-

Not Her Dream Hero

A prospective divorce suit in high society was under discussion the other day, and the gossips were speculating as to the probable ground upon which the wife's application would be based. Apparently nobody knew, though it was taken for granted that the lady, who is a representative of one of the most exclusive families in the city, had resolved upon divorcing her husband who is now "doing" Europe while she is indulging in her usual round of dinners and bridge parties. One of the gossips whose acquaintance with the prospective grass-widow dates back to their debutante days, grew reminiscent. "Before her marriage," she said, "there was an ideal man with whom she was most ardently in love. He did not exist of course, but she realized him in her dreams. She said he was the man she meant to marry.

One of the clever amateurs who are to appear in "A Night Off" for the benefit of the California Woman's Hospital.

She called him 'My Mr. Jones' and so frequently did she rhapsodize about him that to us he became a living, breathing personality."

"What was he like?" the reminiscent one was asked.

"He was everything that her husband is not" was the reply."

And the gossips concluded that while there was perhaps no legal ground for a divorce, the lady was aggrieved because of the vast difference between her dream hero and the reality." As this is the month of brides and there are several weddings on the tapis, so July, some one has suggested, should be dedicated to the divorce court, as four are rumored and under discussion.

The Barbaric Toothpick

Upon the return of young Mayo Newhall for his college vacation in June Mrs. William Mayo Newhall and her daughters will leave for Santa Barbara to spend some weeks. The Newhalls were the recipients of much social attention last year in the southern part of the State. At a dinner given in honor of Miss Marion and Miss Elizabeth toothpicks were passed, to the horror of Miss Marion, who did not scruple to express her opinion of such barbarism. As the hostess of the occasion was generally assumed to be in the first rank of culture and fashion, the open criticism of a society girl created a sensation, but there are few who have the courage of their convictions and the independence to express them.

already she has gathered unto herself sixty-three cups. The date of the wedding has been set for the last week in October, and Drummond McGavin, who is still away at the mines, is moving heaven and earth to so order affairs that their permanent home may be in San Francisco. The young people had been engaged for several weeks before they made a formal announcement, and though some of their friends had surmises concerning the direction of the wind, when the story was finally told they were all genuinely surprised that matters had progressed so far. The McGavins and the Bakers knew from the beginning, but apart from the immediate relatives, Mrs. McGavin says there were but two sharers in the news, Miss Edith Pillsbury and the McGavin's Chinese cook. When Mrs. Pillsbury discovered with whom she was bracketed she could not restrain her merriment. "Well, she said, "I am glad I was in such good company, and so was one of the two first to tender congratulations."

The Swiss Navy Invited

In seeking the co-operation of the foreign consuls in the matter of a naval display at the Portola festival, no invidious distinctions have been drawn, and Anton Borel, the Consul for Switzerland has received, amongst the rest, a politely worded request that he will exert his best endeavors to have the country which he has the honor to represent send at least one of her war ships to our waters in the fall. It looks as though the committee had been studying the portrait of "Admiral Suisse," as drawn in the Journal Amusant.

"Rushing" a Bride-To-Be

There is at least one bride who does not intend to embark on her career as a housekeeper in a state of last-minute rush. Although the wedding of Miss Alyce Sullivan and Frederick Murphy is not to take place until the thirtieth of June, and is to be one of the largest affairs of the year, they secured their apartment on Vallejo street over a month ago, and it is being completely furnished and put in order under the supervision of its future mistress so that everything will be in readiness on the return from the wedding trip. Innumerable luncheons, teas and dinners are being given in Miss Sullivan's honor, so that, between these festivities and dressmakers' engagements, she can scarcely call her soul her own, but society is rejoicing in her as a motif, for with so many of the elect flown countryward, those that remain in town would find existence dull beyond belief were it not for these pre-nuptial gaieties. The Sullivans and Mr. Murphy, by the way, motored down the peninsula for the week end and spent some time at the Vendome which is still the Mecca of autoists thanks to the managerial ability of Mr. Lake.

A Tall Bridal Party

The marriage of Miss Bessie Louise Dichman and Lieutenant Thurman Harrison Bane was quietly celebrated at three o'clock last Saturday afternoon at the residence of the bride's aunt, Mrs. George J. Bucknall, the ceremony being performed by Rev. A. C. Bane, the father of the groom. A noticeable feature of the wedding party was the tallness of the participants. Miss Dichman is a striking brunette who exceeds the usual inches of womankind, and looked queenly in her robe of white satin, with point lace trimmings, an heirloom in her family, and her bouquet of lilies of the valley and orchids. Miss Bethel Bane, sister of the groom, is a tall, stunning girl, and Miss Marie Louise Bryant, the bride's cousin, though still in her teens, is exceptionally tall, while Lieutenant Bane is himself over six feet in height. The bridesmaids were attired in exquisitely embroidered white mull over yellow satin, and carried shower bouquets of yellow jonquils tied with yellow tulle, the color being chosen in honor of the cavalry, the branch of the service with which the groom is affiliated. Lieutenant Harry Pfeil, the best man, as well as the groom, was in full dress uniform. After the ceremony an informal reception was held, only relatives and near friends being present. When the bride cast her bouquet it was caught by the maids, but in a spirit of sportive mischief Captain Adams reached quietly over and appropriated the prize, thus somewhat complicating the inference to be drawn from the omen. Miss Tuttle found the thimble, Miss Josephine Ellicott the ring, Miss Winifred Mears the coin, while the gold button fell to the lot of Lieutenant Potter, U. S. A. When the hour of departure arrived the bride and groom discovered that they would be too late for the train they had intended to take for Del Monte so they quietly changed their plans and turned the tables in the matter of practical jokes. They drove to the residence of the bride's cousin, Mrs. A. W. Bryant, and there removed the rice from their clothing and procuring more of the grain sprinkled it lavishly all over the house and front steps. With the assistance of the chauffeur they also removed the tell-tale decorations from the auto and disposed them about the stairway, and then, coolly and leisurely proceeded to the depot and took a train for San Jose, stopping at the Vendome. When Mrs. Bryant and other of the wedding guests returned to their flat, their consternation may be imagined. Mrs. Bryant pressed Lieutenant Harry Pfeil into service with a broom and he, nothing if not gallant, presented an alluring spectacle to the neighborhood, an army officer in full dress uniform, performing the services of a street sweeper, while Mrs. Bryant enacted the role of Commander in Chief. Lieutenant Bane and his bride returned to the city on Monday and stopped at the St. Francis, leaving on Tuesday evening for Sequoia Park, where the lieutenant is stationed for the summer.

The Spreckels Case Romance

The announcement of the engagament of young Claus Spreckels in Paris to Miss Mary Case of Portland came as a surprise to society in this city. It has served to revive recollections of the romance which developed and flourished last summer when young Spreckels and young Palmer Fuller seemed to have lost their hearts completely to the charming young girl who was Mrs. Fuller's guest at Del Monte. At the close of the season it was conceded that the laurels were likely to go to young Spreckels.

An Historic Christening Robe

An interesting ceremony took place on Sunday afternoon at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Kirkham Wright when the young son of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Torney, formerly Jeanette Wright, was baptized. The young man, who has attained the age of three weeks, receiving the name of Kirkham Wright, after his grandfather. The Reverend Father Carey of the Paulist church read the service. Mrs. Torney, the grandmother, and Mrs. Schultz, formerly Edith Curry, were the god mothers, while Kirkham Wright assumed the responsibilities on the paternal side for his grandson. The home was attractively decorated with exquisite roses and a pretty sentiment was perpetuated in the christening robe, a rare specimen of hand embroidery, which has now been worn for three successive generations. It was Mrs. Kirkham Wright's own christening robe, and served again for each of her daughters, Miss Marion, and Jeanette, the mother of the baby. After the ceremony dainty refreshments were served, and appropriate toasts

Californians in Honolulu

Mr. and Mrs. Walter Scott (Miss Ethel Amweg(are spending their honeymoon in Honolulu, where they are stopping at the Alexander Young Hotel. The bride created quite a sensation by appearing at each meal in a different gown with hat and shoes to match, lavender being her favorite color. Another bridal couple at the Alexander Young Hotel are the Marcel Cerfs. Mrs. Cerf, who was Miss Katherine Martin, enjoys riding, and presents a pretty sight on horseback, as she sits her animal well. She is a tall, stunning blonde, and a noticeable figure wherever she appears. She has made a host of friends during her visit to the islands. They have made the Alexander Young Hotel their headquarters, but have spend much of their time visiting friends. Recently the Cerfs were guests of Captain and Mrs. Edward Sturgis, formerly Edna Montgomery. Captain Sturgis is now stationed at Honolulu. Dr. and Mrs. Frederick Morong, formerly Bessie Hannigan, will soon return to San Francisco to reside permanently, after living for two years in Honolulu. It will be a sad home coming, owing to the recent death of Mrs. Morong, wife of Captain Morong and mother of Dr. Frederick Morong.

The Borden-Collins Marriage

A marriage which is of unusual interest is that of Miss Hester Borden, only child of Mr. and Mrs. Ivey Lewis Borden, and Paymaster Henry Ellis Collins, U. S. N., which will take place on Tuesday evening, June 8, in Trinity church. Reverend Frederick Clampett officiating, with a reception following at the home of the bride's parents on Devisadero street. The bridesmaids will be Miss Adelaide Linn of Georgia and Miss Juliet Borden, a cousin, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Sheldon Borden of Los Angeles. Lieutenant Staton, U. S. N., will be best man. The decorations and bridesmaid's costumes will be pink. Mrs. Ivey Borden was Miss Dixie Thompson, daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. R. R. Thompson who died recently, leaving an immense fortune, a large part of which Mrs. Borden inherited. Mr. Borden is affiliated with the old time Southern aristocracy.

A Pink Wedding

June 22nd has been selected as the wedding day of Miss Bertha Eldredge Smith and Captain George Bigelow Pillsbury, U. S. A. The ceremony will take place at high noon at St. Paul's church, and the affair will be another pink wedding. Mrs. Philip Van Horne Lansdale, a sister of the bride, will be the matron of honor, but full details will not be completed until the arrival of Captain Pillsbury from the east next week. Miss Smith is one of the three interesting daughters of the late Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Smith, whose beautiful country home, just beyond the gates of the Hotel Rafael, is one of the show places of San Rafael and has been the scene of many entertainments. A reception at the Smith home on Broadway and Webster streets will follow the church ceremony. Later the bride and groom will leave for their future home in the east.

A Startling Rumor

The rumor was set afloat the other day that the committee in charge of the Portola Festival might be put to the harrowing necessity of selecting another Queen. For, according to the tale, members of the Bogue family, not at all pleased with the celebrity which had come to the beautiful Vergilia in consequence of her fatal gift, were thinking of taking her on a trip to Europe. When the rumor reached the ears of the committee it caused something like consternation. Mr. Andrew McCarthy was thrown into a state of panic and talked about getting out a blanket injunction in Judge Deasy's court. Mr. McCarthy is of the opinion that Miss Bogue is an ideal queen, and the prospect of finding a substitute appalled him. But fortunately there is not the slightest danger of losing Queen Vergilia. It is true that at first her parents were in no amiable mood. The rush of limelight was bewildering, but they have begun to take the situation philosophically. Besides Queen Vergilia is in no mood to resign her sceptre. She is imbued with the true civic spirit, and feels that it is her duty to do her utmost toward making the festival a success. She is as sensible as she is beautiful.

Californians in New York

Mrs. Moseley, who is now a resident of New York, recently gave a tea in honor of visiting Californians, amongst whom were Mrs. Dixwell Hewitt, Mrs. Joseph Tobin, Mrs. Hooper and Miss Sallie Maynard. Miss Jennie Flood and Miss Sallie Maynard also entertained at a tea. It is rumored that before returning to San Francisco Miss Flood will visit Paris still having Miss Maynard as her guest. Miss Lillie Lawlor gave a concert in New York not long ago, at which were seen Mr.

Hawaiian Belle to Christen Ship

"The launching of the new Matson steamship Wilhelmina, at Newport News, Virginia, next September, is to be a very important affair, socially for Hawaii," writes my Honolulu correspondent. "The steamship, which is designed for the run between San Francisco and Honolulu is to be given the name of Wilhelmina the eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. E. D. Tenney, and the young lady herself is to christen it. With her parents she will leave pretty soon for the east where the summer will be spent at some of the best known summer resorts, and they will go to Newport News in September. Quite a large number of island people are planning to be present at the launching. The Tenneys are among the most popular society folk in Honolulu. Mr. Tenney is at the head of the old and immensely wealthy house of Castle & Cooke. Mrs. Tenney is a daughter of the late Captain Makee who was prominent in the development of the sugar industry of the islands. His home and hospitality were proverbial throughout the islands, and his daughters have always been leaders in island society."

The Summer Hegira

The first emphatic indications of the opening of the summer season were to be observed last Saturday when all San Francisco seemed to be rushing down the peninsula in railroad trains and automobiles. The hegira continued on Sunday, and there was more activity in and about the Vendome Hotel in San Jose than in any of the hotels in this city. In the spacious and beautiful grounds of the hotel there was a continuous procession of autos and the hotel dining-room Sunday night presented a most colorful picture so brilliant was the display of gowns.

In the Social Spotlight

Captain Halimand P. Young, relieved from duty as Quartermaster in the Philippines, will arrive with Mrs. Young, early in September, to await further orders. Mrs. Young was Miss Marie Voorhies, prominent in local society, and it is hoped that the Captain will be stationed here, or at least, somewhere in California.

Mrs. Nicholas Van Bergen and her sister, Mrs. William Browning, motored to Paso Robles last week.

The Albert Sidney Johnston Chapter, No. 79, N. D. C., held their monthly meeting at the home of Mrs. Selden S. Wright on Thursday, June 3.

Miss Elizabeth Newhall has been at Santa Cruz, the guest of Mrs. Andrew Welch.

Miss Linda Cadwalader has been visiting Miss Mary Josselyn at her flat on Broadway, while Miss Marjorie Josselyn has been the house guest of Miss Maud Bourne in Grass Valley for a fortnight, returning to the city last week.

Hall Rowe, son of Mrs. Laura Rowe, will spend the summer in the Yosemite.

Miss Lillian Wheeler, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Stetson Wheeler, will return from Vassar this month, after which the Wheelers will go to their country home on the McCloud river for the summer.

Colonel and Mrs. Edward F. Miles, and Mr. and Mrs. Brennan Brady will spend the summer at their ranch near Aetna Springs.

Dr. and Mrs. F. Souli (Miss Lourey) have taken the apartments of J. D. Redding, No. 7 Rue Scribe, Paris.

The Misses Mackenzie of San Jose entertained with a luncheon recently in honor of Lieutenant Governor and Mrs. Porter. Other guests were Madame Porter of Watsonville, Mrs. H. Pfingst of Kentucky, Mrs. P. G. Coltu of Los Angeles and Mr. and Mrs. J. T. Burke of Berkeley, and Miss Bamaid of Oakland, Dr. H. C. Brown, J. D. Mackenzie and A. S. Mackenzie.

Mr. and Mrs. C. H. R. Schmidt have been suddenly called east on account of the serious illness of their son Herbert, who is in Philadelphia. It will be remembered that their beautiful daughter, Erna, died very suddenly three or four years ago after returning from a luncheon, leaving Herbert their only child. Much sympathy is felt for the parents.

Mrs. Bessie Riddell, who has been spending the winter in Baltimore, the guest of her sister, Mrs. Orlando Bird Bidwell, formerly Leslie Tilden, will return to California in the middle of June. She is a daughter of the late Joseph Tilden, prom-

One of the interesting affairs of the week was the banquet of the class of 1884, University of California, held at the St. Francis Hotel. The arrangements were in the hands of Frank Powers, Charles Stewart and Charles Stetson Wheeler, and the staid and grave businessmen of today sat from half past seven in the evening until one the next morning talking over times past, and listening to speeches and toasts.

MAYERLE MOVES DOWN TOWN

Mr. George Mayerle, the optical specialist, has established himself down town, having taken the entire store at 960 Market street for eight years at a rental of $48,000. It is nearly eighteen years ago that Mr. Mayerle urged upon all opticians in good standing the advisability of forming a national organization, and through the efforts of the proposor the association eventually formed is one of the strongest optical organizations in the world today. Mr. Mayerle stands high in the next largest optical association in the United States, also, the Optical Specialists' Association, of which he has been unanimously elected president three times in succession. He is the inventor of the Mayerle International Eye Test Chart and has United States patents on a new eye test cabinet, both of which inventions are endorsed highly by the presidents of many of the State Optical Societies. Several new instruments are now installed for the examination and correction of complicated cases of defective sight. Practical experience combined with theoretical knowledge extending well forward towards a quarter of a century is his working equipment, and the large number of those who, obliged to resort to artificial assistance, find their way to Mayerle's as a matter of course, is evidence of his integrity and success.

out speculative support. What now seems to be established as a certainty, however, is that there will not be the usual liberal supply of early cotton from those parts of Texas which commonly plant at a very early date and supply the bulk of the September cotton. This means that the first consignments of new cotton cannot reach the foreign consumer before November and as all have heard the confession of the International Federation of Spinners, in session at Milan, Italy, to the effect that in view of the large number of spindles there is not the slightest doubt that when trade revives there will arise an enormously increased demand for cotton, therefore, it appears to us that regardless of what the size of the growing crop may be, there is every possibility that the world will be face to face with a cotton famine of first magnitude before new cotton can move in sufficient volume to provide relief. The strength of the new crops already shows evidence of much forward protection quietly creeping into the market and it may be that the day is not far off when the three leading future markets will find themselves over pledged to the world for supplies. Bullish possibilities are therefore very great still.

A Sunday-school superintendent who always conducts the lesson review in his school, spends about five minutes in explaining the lesson, and then asks: "Now, has any one a question to ask?" One Sunday he explained the lesson as usual, dwelling at length on its chief thoughts, and wound up with the usual question: "Now, has any one a question to ask?" A member of the boys' junior class raised his hand. "Well, what is your question?" asked the superintendent. "Please, sir, are we going to have a picnic this summer?"

There is a specially fine brand of Havana cigars distinguished by a green and gold band which nobody in Germany save the emperor is privileged to smoke.

The privilege of dressing retainers in scarlet liveries is restricted in England to the monarch.

In Abyssinia only royalties may wear an earring in the left ear.

In the United States the franking privilege lasts not only during the period of federal office holding, but until the first day of the December following its expiration.

In Arkansas there is a superstitution that if a lighted match or half-burned paper lighter is thrown under the chair of a card player it will change his luck and he will cease to win.

In Scotland a boy of fourteen years can contract a legal and binding marriage with a girl of twelve but he may not smoke. He can be stopped, searched and tobacco in any form found in his possession may be confiscated, but it needs due process of law to separate him from his wife.

In Switzerland the railroad companies obviate disputes over the ages and consequent half-rates for children by regulating their charges according to height. There is a measuring scale at the ticket window and the child whose head reaches a certain point must pay full fare, be it five years old or fifteen.

ON THE BEACH AT CAPITOLA

Stage

Ethel Barrymore at the Van Ness

One of the interesting events of the current theatrical season will be the annual engagement of Miss Ethel Barrymore, who will be seen at the Van Ness Theatre for two weeks commencing next Monday night. This year Charles Frohman has selected for Miss Barrymore "Lady Frederick," a new comedy from the pen of W. Somerset Maugham, the author of "Jack Straw." There are entertaining and novel situations, bright dialogue and brilliant epigrams in "Lady Frederick." The central character, Lady Frederick Berrolles, the part played by Miss Barrymore, is said to suit her personality wonderfully well. Lady Frederick is a handsome, dashing Irish widow, head over heels in debt, but she manages by the force of her flattery, her in expressible charm of manner and personal beauty, to say nothing of the power she has of making men fall in love with her, to keep her creditors comparatively docile. The plot of the play concerns chiefly the efforts of a certain dowager to prevent her son from marrying the widow. Of course Lady Frederick wins the battle, but she rejects the young man, by disillusionizing him, and marries his uncle. Charles Frohman is sending a strong company with Miss Barrymore and among those in the cast are Bruce McRae, Norman Tharp, Charles Hammond, Arthur Elliott, Orlando Daly, James Kearney, Jessie Millward, Vera Stowe, Anita Rothe and others. During Miss Barrymore's engagement matinees will be given Saturdays only.

At the Alcazar

At the end of the second and final week of "Arizona" at the Alcazar three popular members of the stock company will sever their connection with the theatre. Will R. Walling and his wife (Effie Bond) will retire to their Napa county farm to engage in horticulture, and John B. Maher will return to his home in New York, where he will rest until the call of the stage becomes irresistible. Those who have witnessed this production of "Arizona" and are competent to compare it with the original presentation are enthusiastic over so notable a stock production. This happy condition is the result of each of the Alcazar players being fitted with a role adapted to his or her best acting qualities, coupled with stage settings that are both elaborate and new. It is a strong play, equipped with plot, characterization, situations, atmosphere and dialogue, so that only competent interpretation is needed to make it of compelling interest. With the exception of Mr. and Mrs. Walling and Mr. Maher, all the present Alcazarans will be retained during Florence Roberts' season, which opens Monday evening after next with a sumptuous production of "Du Barry." Thurlow Bergen will be Miss Roberts' leading man.

"The Blue Mouse" at the American

Slangy remarks coupled with an air of childish innocence make the character of "The Blue Mouse" in Clyde Fitch's play of that name one of the most interesting of its kind that the stage has known. The success which it scored at the Lyric Theatre in New York, and the enthusiasm it excites wherever it is produced are advance evidence of its popularity. Being one of the best money-makers under the control of the Shuberts, the managers of the American Theatre take no little pride in having secured it for a San Francisco presentation, beginning June 13th. This "cleverest comedy that Fitch has ever turned out" held the board a whole year in Germany and is still running there as well as in France. It has been presented in Sweden, Austria and Denmark, and bids fair to continue in Europe for another season after this. It is a big production, with one of the largest casts ever seen in a play of similar character. Manager A. S. Cohen announces that with "The Blue Mouse" there will follow an entire season of Shubert productions at the American.

Cunningham at the Valencia

The last performances of "The Donagh," with Arthur Cunningham in his rollicking role of "Lanty Killaly," will take place at the Valencia Theatre this Sunday afternoon and evening. On Monday night Dion Boucicault's greatest play, "The Colleen Bawn," will be staged with all the favorites of the Valencia Stock Company in the cast and Mr. Cunningham in the wonderful part of Myles Na Coppaleen. Perhaps the subtitle, "The Brides of Garryowen," gives a quicker glimpse into the meaning of the play's story than the one that is better know. The brides are Eily O'Connor and Anne Chute, the one a peasant girl, the other the daughter of a wealthy landowner. Secretly, Eily has been married to Hardress Cregan, a country gentleman, whose estates have dwindled. Mrs. Cregan's insistance on the marriage of her son to Anne Chute that their fortunes may be built up, causes Hardress many an uneasy hour, and in a moment of weakness he falters in his allegiance to his bride. Eily learns of this, and with noble self sacrifice is about to destroy her marriage lines, when Myles Na Coppaleen, a big-hearted young moonshiner, discovers her purpose and with the aid of the schoolmaster makes Eily swear never to part with the precious paper. Hardress has a faithful protege, Danny Mann, a young boy, crippled in his childhood by Hardress. Seeing his master's anxiety over the condition of affairs, and not understanding that beneath all Hardress loves the Colleen Bawn, Danny steals the paper and attempts to kill the girl. Myles manages to save the Colleen's life, but believes that Hardress himself has been the villain who has attempted to murder Eily. He tracks Hardress down, and were it not for a timely confession on the part of the cripple, it would go hard with the young man. In the end Eily is assured of the faithful love of her husband, Anne Chute takes unto herself her own choice of a husband and Myles Na Coppaleen is happy in having brought peace to both the couples. Pretty Edith Lyle will make a winsome Colleen Bawn, Grace Travers will have the equally good part of Anne Chute, Lillian Andrews will have a role that fits her to a nicety as Sheelah and Karra Kenwyn will be Mrs. Cregan. Paul McAllister will be Hardress, George Osbourne will have a congenial role as Father Tom and Robert Homans, Charles Dow Clark, Edward Clisbee, Robert McKim and important others will complete the cast. Mr. Cunningham will sing, for the first time on any stage, "The Flag that We Love to See Fly," by W. O. McGeehan, the well-known local journalist, "The Cruiskeen Lawn," "The Old Plaid Shawl" and "The Colleen Bawn," while "The Pretty Girl Milking the Cow" and "Limerick the Beautiful" will be sung by other members of the cast.

A Circus at the Orpheum

The latest novelty in vaudeville will be in evidence next week at the Orpheum. It is the Ellis-Nowlan Company which will introduce a real old fashioned one ring circus with twenty acrobats and comedians. This act will show the usual circus parade in which the members of the company, a cage of wild animals, a steam caliope and a silver cornet band take part. There are ground and lofty tumblers, bareback riders, fluffy-ruffle equestrians, funny and frolicsome clowns, the ballyhoo, the red, white and blue lemonade and all the paraphernalia of a circus. Miss Cheridah Simpson, late star of "The Red Feather" will contribute songs and pianologues. She is a delightful vocalist and an accomplished pianist. Rossister's Novelty Dancing Four, quick-stepping dancers of the American school and Harrison Armstrong's dramatic episode "A Spotless Reputation," with Albert L. Pellaton and William Foran are the other novel acts. Next week will be the last of Claude Gillingwater, The Vindobonas, Billy Van and of Mabel Hite and Mike Donlin in their great hit "Stealing Home."

Princess Theatre

The musical comedy company now playing with great success at the Princess will close its present engagement at that theatre the end of next week and during the grand opera season there, will visit the principal cities in Southern California. It will say au revoir in three of its greatest triumphs. On Monday, Thursday and Saturday night "The Umpire" will be revived with Fred Mace and May Boley in the principal roles; Tuesday, Friday and Sunday nights and Sunday matinee "Piff Paff Pouf" will be the program and by special request "Peggy From Paris" will be given on Wednesday night and Saturday matinee.

Grand Opera at the Princess

The W. A. Edwards International Grand Opera Company will begin a season of Grand Opera at the Princess Theatre Monday evening, June 14th. This splendid organization has won the unanimous approval of New York and the principal Eastern cities and its visit may be most pleasantly anticipated. The list of artists is as follows: Sopranos, Bertozzi, Duce-Merola, Norelli, Novelli, Zarad; Contraltos, Strauss and Bossi; Tenors, Bari, Colombini, Samueloff, Amani, Guiliani; Baritones, Arcangeli, Zara, Frascona, Cecci; Bassos, Gravina, Bozzano, Oteri; Conductor, Signor G. Merola; Technical Director, G. Pelluso. The organization which includes an entire orchestra, ballet and chorus, is now on its way here and is expected to arrive Sunday. The sale of seats will begin this Monday at the box office and the prices will range from $2.00 to 50 cents. The repertoire for the first week will be: Monday, Aida; Tuesday, Il Trovatore; Wednesday, matinee and Friday night, Cavalleria Rusticana and Pagliacci; Wednesday, Fedora; Thursday, Carmen; Saturday, matinee and Sunday night, Traviata; Saturday "Giaconda." In Aida, Signorina Lina Bertozzi who was such an immense favorite when she appeared here with the Milani Opera Company will sing the title role. Signor Arcangeli who was also a popular member of the same company will appear as the Ethiopian King and Signor Gravina who distinguished himself during the last Tettrazini season at the Tivoli will be the High Priest.

"Old Heidelberg" at Ye Liberty

Richard Mansfield's most lasting success, "Old Heidelberg," will be the offering of the Bishop Players at Ye Liberty Playhouse for the week commencing Monday evening. This piece was selected as Landers Stevens' closing bill, for with the performances of next week Stevens closes his remarkably long and successful season as leading man at the Oakland playhouse. In selecting this play for his farewell appearances the management had in view the fact that it was the medium of his most notable success. In his entire stage career Stevens has done nothing better than his characterization of Karl Heinrich, the heir apparent, in this delightful play of German court and student life, and it goes without saying that next week he will duplicate his success. "Old Heidelberg" will be given the same careful interpretation that characterizes all Ye Liberty productions. The cast will include Miss Helen Holmes as "Kathie," Henry Shumer as the old doctor and all the remainder of the favorites in equally congenial roles. There will be the usual chorus of voices in the college songs, and the same attractive scenic production.

In the Limelight

John Drew will make his final appearance as Jack Straw on Saturday night at the Van Ness Theatre. His engagement has been brilliantly successful.

During the period from nine o'clock last Monday morning when the box office of the Van Ness opened for the day till ten at night there were by actual count forty-seven inquiries for seats for "The Merry Widow" although the engagement of that musical triumph is still four weeks off. The engagement promises to break all records for theatre attendance in this city.

Marie Wainwright will be seen in the company to appear here in support of Marie Doro in "The Morals of Marcus."

W. Somerset Maugham, the author of "Lady Frederick" and "Jack Straw" has the remarkable distinction of having, at the present time, four of his plays performed at four of London's leading theatres.

Frederick Thompson's big production of "Polly of the Circus" will be one of the attractions during the summer season at the Van Ness Theatre.

Mrs. Fiske and her company from the Manhattan Theatre, New York, will begin a two weeks' engagement at the Valencia Theatre in "Salvation Nell," Monday, June 14th.

A Napoleonic Play

The "wickedest and cleverest man in Paris," the late Catulle Mendes, furnished France with a posthumous sensation when Madame Rejane produced at her theatre in the French capital his play of Napoleon in Elba, entitled "L'Imperatrice." The play has attracted widespread attention. The success of "L'Imperatrice" appears to be largely due to the number of affecting historical pictures which it presents. The acting of Madame Rejane as the heroine is said to be full of grace and sensibility, and M. de Max is said to personate Napoleon with much poetic enthusiasm. Despite all criticism, the glamor of Napoleon is perennial. He is the one incarnation of the Superman known to the Modern World.

MURINE EYE REMEDY CO., Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen:—We have a little fellow four months old who was troubled for three months after birth with sore eyes. A large amount of pus came from them, accompanied with severe inflammation. Our family Doctor, also an Eye Specialist, attended him without relief.

I saw your MURINE EYE REMEDY advertised in one of our Electric Cars, and utterly discouraged, I resolved to try it, and do you know, in three days' time all worry was over. In one week the Sore Eyes were a thing of the past.

This is an unasked for testimonial, but I know you will accept it as it is sent with much gratitude toward MURINE EYE REMEDY.

Yours truly,
Arthur Snow.

The Pioneer Automobile Company reports the following sales for the past week: Mrs. E. H. Koenig, San Francisco, Chalmers-Detroit "30" touring car; J. P. Costello, 70 H. P. Thomas Flyabout; George F. Dowling, Oakland, Baby Oldsmobile; Newton Cleveland, Folsom, 60 H. P. Thomas Flyabout; C. A. Warden 70 H. P. Flyabout; Charles T. Lougenour, Woodland, six-cylinder 40 H. P. Thomas Flyer; C. Ferni, San Francisco, "30" H. P. Chalmers-Detroit touring car; J. W. Dougherty, Pleasanton, "30" H. P. touring car; Mrs. Minnie Hall, San Francisco, Oldsmobile Special Runabout.

Accompanied by a party of friends, Robert McMullen of the State Savings Bank, Oakland, made a trip to Lake County this week in his Thomas six-cylinder 70 horsepower Flyer. He was accompanied by Dr. J. M. Statdlar, Dr. Paul Lanz, Dr. William Friedman, Dr. Archie Kerr, Frank Frost, and John Smith. They had a splendid trip which Mr. McMullen reports in the following letter to Manager Bullis of the Oakland Branch of the Pioneer Automobile Company: "I have just returned from a trip all through Lake County with my Model K 6-70 Thomas Flyer, and will say that I never before have seen, or driven a car, that will handle the roads and do the real hard work that my car will. Pieta grade and everything on the high—no shifting at all. We had a perfect score, as it were, and did not do anything but ride and enjoy ourselves. We took no one's dust and will never take it if the road is wide enough to pass as we have the dope to do it with. Also permit me to thank you for the courtesy shown me at your home office in San Francisco. Trusting that you are enjoying a prosperous year, I remain, R. J. McMullin."

Now that the touring and racing season is at its height, the matter of proper inflation of tires, that is, the number of pounds air pressure necessary to obtain the best service, has come in for considerable discussion. Speaking of the matter yesterday, C. E. Mathewson, Pacific Coast Manager of the Diamond Rubber Co., stated that as a result of the long experience of his company in such matters 5½ inch tires should have 110 pounds pressure, 5 inch tires 100 pounds, 4½ inch tires 90 pounds, 4 inch tires 80 pounds, 3½ inch tires 75 pounds, and 3 inch tires 60 pounds. That such pressures are correct for the sectional sizes given and that the Diamond Rubber Company's knowledge of the proper sizes for the various weight cars is beyond question is shown in Mr. Mathewson's personal supervision of the tire equipment of the cars which have successfully broken long-distanced records, the true test of tire quality, such as the Los Angeles-San Diego round trip record, Los Angeles-Santa Barbara record, the Santa Rosa Road Race, and the famous San Francisco-Los Angeles record, in all of which events Diamond Tires gave absolutely no trouble.

The Howard Automobile Company reports the following sales: Waterman Bros. Company, Fresno, four; Salbach-Middlekauf Company, Stockton, three; Phillips Drayage & Warehouse Company, Sacramento, two; A. C. Shaw, Lodi, two. One each to the following: Raymond Jackson, San Francisco; Dr. J. H. Topley, Vallejo; Bert Dingley, Modesto; Guynn & Morgan, Chico; Watsonville Garage, Watsonville; O. H. Bullene, Salinas; C. Parker Holt, San Francisco; E. L. Stewart, Denverton; Clipp Bros., Grimes; Carl Christensen, Oakland; T. L. Crane, San Rafael; Crane Bros., Livermore; Stanford Auto Company, Palo Alto; Menardi Music Company, Reno; Dr. J. Rochex, San Francisco; E. F. Foredyce, Eureka; F. F. Leigh, Mountain View.

HOW TO OBTAIN GOVERNMENT TIMBER OR AGRICULTURAL LANDS

Without Having to Live on the Land a Day

The average individual thinks that the only way to get title to Government Lands is make a homestead entry and live on same five years before getting a title. He is of the opinion he is limited to 160 acres and he would not live on a tract of land five years if the Government would deed him over one-half of a state. There is a way for any citizen of the United States to obtain title to any Government timber or agricultural land in any state in the Union without residence or cultivation. The only way to do this is to buy U. S. Government Land certificates and pay for your land with same. Railroads and timbermen obtain title to Government Land in this way.

The Government discontinued issuing these certificates about the year 1883 therefore they are getting very scarce. The firm of H. B. Sanders and Co., Judge Building, Salt Lake City, Utah, have secured a few thousand acres of them that they are offering at the rate of $25.00 per acre. The certificates come in 80 and 120 acre pieces, and can be located on any timber or agricultural land in Alaska or any state in the Union. Each piece has a letter of approval attached to it from the Government, and there is no limit to the time in which to locate them. According to the official report of the Department of Interior under date of July 1, 1908, there is still over 75 million acres of unappropriated land in Oregon, Washington, California and Idaho. Some of the finest timber land in the world is open for entry in these states. Any person wishing to get title to some timber land or anticipating starting a townsite in the west can get full particulars by writing the above firm.

Letters

"The Strain of White"

Whether it is the immediate result of the extensive advertising of the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition, or due to some more obscure cause, the Northwest has suddenly loomed into the foreground as a field of enterprise for fiction, and novels with their scenes set in the Puget Sound district are following on each other as rapidly as the romances of the Zenda school did after that land of imagination was opened to view. Ada Woodruff Anderson has contributed her portion in "The Strain of White," and a fine, blood-stirring tale she has made of it. While especially disclaiming an effort to product a historical novel, and pointing out the discrepancies between known facts and her own fictions, the truth is that Mrs. Anderson has taken no greater liberties than did that first of historical novelists, Sir Walter Scott, who juggled with facts and incidents to suit his needs. The time in which "The Strain of White" is set is the middle of the nineteenth century, at the close of the period of joint occupancy, and the interest is divided between the fate of the half-bred Indian girl Francesca and the Indian uprising which followed the making of the treaty in which the Indians were virtually juggled out of their lands. The events are not so old but that many of the incidents live in the memories of the first settlers, and though there may never have been a veritable Francesca, there were too many such tragedies of the half-breed in that section for her case to be regarded as other than typical. Francesca's father, in the days of his irresponsible lieutenancy, had come west on a furlough, married the daughter of a Yakima chief according to tribal rites, and, his vacation over, had returned to the east to marry in more orthodox fashion, deserting his Indian bride and not so much as thinking of the possibility of a child of the half-blood. Now, advanced in rank, as commandant of the newly established post at Fort Steilacoom, and with his white wife and daughter, he frowned on the attractive Indian girl who the dowagers feared would capture the hearts of the eligible youths. Neither Francesca nor any of the white settlers knew of her parentage, and it was in order to extract information concerning the identity of her "Boston" father that she took the long journey to the country of the Klickitats of whom her uncle was the chief. Neither did it occur to the girl that, once discovered, the superior "Boston" would have anything but a warm welcome for her. But Francesca was too white to please her Indian kin, while the strain of darker blood made her the despised and rejected of the white race. All her ambitions and inclinations had been towards her father's people, but repudiated and cast off by him she tried to reach the opposite extreme of becoming altogether Indian. When the tribes, dissatisfied with the outcome of the treaty revolted, the barbarities of the Indian warfare sickened her, and finding Lucia a prisoner in the camp she contrived to deliver that precious bit of femininity into safe keeping, and warn the village of Seattle of the coming attack, after which, forgotten and overlooked by Lucia as well as the others, she turned back to look for her old childhood's playmate, loyal Billy Haworth, who gave up his young life in defence of Lucia. It is an accepted fact in the realms of fiction that the army and navy are maintained solely that the Lucias may have an abundance of suitors with whom to amuse themselves, but one could wish the lieutenant of the Decatur a better fate than to be linked forever to her, with the dead body of poor Haworth lying between them. One is not supposed to carry romance further than the last page else there would be abundant room for doubts of the stability of any union with one of her character. The story ends with the subjugation of the tribes and the reconciliation of the commandant's household, for, if for no other reason, he would have been driven by gratitude to acknowledge the paternity of the half-Indian daughter through whose ministrations his white child had been restored and the worst features of the Indian attack frustrated. "The White Strain" has enough history in it to make a good starting point for serious study, and yet is not so "historical" as to make dry reading. It is worth while. ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY MORTGAGE SHOULD NOT BE RENEWED

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California—No. 7168. Dept. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of CHARLOTTE F. CLARKE, Deceased.

Upon reading and filing the petition of Charles G. Lyman, executor of the Last Will and Testament of CHARLOTTE F. CLARKE, deceased,

It is ordered that all persons interested in said estate be and appear before this court in the courtroom thereof, in the Grant Building, on the southeast corner of Market and Seventh Streets, San Francisco, California, on Wednesday, the 16th day of June, 1909, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m. of said day, then and there to show cause, if any they have, why the said Charles G. Lyman as such executor should not make, execute and deliver to James Otis, trustee under the will of A. C. Whitcomb, deceased, a promissory note in writing for the sum of $45,000, with interest thereon at the rate of seven and one-half per cent per annum gross, and make, execute and deliver to the said James Otis, trustee under the will of A. C. Whitcomb, deceased, a mortgage as security for said promissory note, of the following described real estate:

Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the southerly line of O'Farrell Street with the easterly line of Mason Street, running thence southerly and along said easterly line of Mason Street eighty-seven (87) feet six (6) inches; thence at right angles easterly fifty-five (55) feet; thence at right angles northerly eighty-seven (87) feet six (6) inches, and thence at right angles westerly and along said southerly line of O'Farrell Street fifty-five (55) feet to the easterly line of Mason Street and the point of commencement, being a part of fifty vara block No. 197.

Reference is hereby made to the petition on file herein for further particulars.

It is further ordered that this notice be published once a week for four successive weeks in Town Talk, a newspaper of general circulation in said City and County.

Dated, May 11th, 1909. THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge.

WINIFRED TRUBY, Plaintiff,
vs.
JAMES MICHAEL TRUBY, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to JAMES MICHAEL TRUBY, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's failure to provide plaintiff herein with any of the necessaries of life; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY SALE OF REAL ESTATE SHOULD NOT BE MADE

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California—Dept. 10, No. 7168.

In the Matter of the Estate of CHARLOTTE F. CLARKE, Deceased.

Upon reading and filing the petition of Charles G. Lyman, executor of the last will and testament of CHARLOTTE F. CLARKE, deceased,

It is ordered that all persons interested in the estate of Charlotte F. Clarke, deceased, appear in said Court on Thursday, the 17th day of June, 1909, at the hour of 10 o'clock A. M. of said day, and the courtroom of said Court, Department No. 10 thereof, in the Grant Building on the Southeast corner of Market and Seventh streets in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, then and there to show cause, if any they have, why the said Charles G. Lyman as such executor, should not sell the following described real estate, situate, lying and being in the Township of Brooklyn, County of Alameda, State of California, bounded and described as follows:

Beginning at the most southern corner of that certain piece or parcel of land containing 32.56 acres heretofore conveyed by Chas. W. Leach to Elizabeth Leach by deed dated January 16th, 1894, and recorded in Liber 527 of Deeds, page 360, Alameda County Records, said point being on the northern line of County Road No. 724; thence along the southwestern boundary line of said 32.56 acre tract North 51 degrees west 10.93 chains; thence North 25 degrees 35 minutes East 4.25 chains; thence North 49 degrees 50 minutes East 1.72 chains; thence North 72 degrees 40 minutes East 3.29 chains; thence South 69 degrees 15 minutes East 5.17 chains; thence North 52 degrees 15 minutes East 2.91 chains; thence North 79 degrees 30 minutes East 1.50 chains; thence South 60 degrees East 2.00 chains; thence South 79 degrees 45 minutes East 4.93 chains to the Northern boundary line of the said 32.56 acre tract; thence along said boundary line South 61 degrees East 4.74 chains to the aforesaid Northern line of County Road No. 724 and thence along said road line South 63 degrees 55 minutes West 13.22 chains South 59 degrees 45 minutes West 6.05 chains to the place of beginning. Containing 18.47 acres and being a portion of the aforesaid 32.56 acre tract.

Excepting the parcel described as follows: Commencing at the intersection of the Southwestern boundary of the land conveyed by Wickham Havens et ux to Arthur H. Breed by deed dated September 12th, 1906, and recorded October 10th, 1906, in Liber 1239 of Deeds, page 73, Alameda County Records, with the Northern line of 13th Avenue, as widened to 100 feet in width and as shown on that certain map entitled "Map showing land to be taken for widening of Thirteenth Avenue or Walker Street from the center line of Hampel Street to the Northern property line of Arthur H. Breed." filed October 10th, 1907, in the office of the Recorder of Alameda County; and from said point of commencement running North 51 degrees .01 minutes West along the Southwestern boundary line of said land conveyed by Havens to Breed 695.48 feet; thence North 25 degrees 24 1-2 minutes East along the Northwestern boundary line of said land so conveyed by Haven to Breed 236.5 feet; thence South 32 degrees 14 1-2 minutes East 101.6 feet; thence Southeasterly on the arc of a circle of 1332.69 feet radius concave to the left or Northeast and tangent to the last aforesaid course 524.2 feet; thence South 54 degrees 47 minutes East tangent to said arc 192.7 feet to said Northern line of said 13th Avenue as widened according to said Map; thence South 59 degrees 33 minutes West along said Northern line of said 13th Avenue 151.62 feet to the point of commencement. Containing 2.57 acres of land.

Also excepting a 25 foot strip of land along the Southeastern line of said property taken for the widening of 13th Avenue, as shown upon the Map of said widening hereinbefore referred to.

It is further ordered that the order to show cause be published for at least once a week for four successive weeks in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and also in the "Alameda Daily Argus," a newspaper of general circulation in the County of Alameda, State of California, for at least once a week for four successive weeks.

Dated May 12th, 1909. THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge.

A KISS DEFINED

A thing of use to no one, but much prized by two.

The baby's right, the lover's privilege, the parent's benison, and the hypocrite's mask.

That which you cannot give without taking, and cannot take without giving.

The flag of truce in the petty wars of courtship and marriage.

The acme of agony to a bashful man.

The only known "smack" that will calm a storm.

The only really agreeable double-faced action under the sun—or the moon, either.

The thunder-clap of the lips which inevitably follows the lightning glance of the eyes.

A report at headquarters.

That in which two heads are better than one.

AN UNANSWERABLE ARGUMENT

Superintendent John Flinn of the Indian school at Chamberlain, S. D., nodded toward a prim, grave little girl.

Sometimes," he said, the arguments of children are unanswerable. You see that little girl with straight black hair tied with a red ribbon? Well, her name is Arrow. She is a chief's daughter. Her father and mother are quite civilized, and she is being brought up in a household as civilized as a Bostonian's.

"In argument it is sometimes impossible to get the better of her. She said to her mother one day:

"'I wish I had a new doll.'

"'But your old doll,' her mother answered, 'is as good as ever.'

"'So am I as good as ever,' little Arrow retorted, 'but the doctor brought you a new baby.'"

NO BITES

He raised his rod and whipped the stream,
And then, when he was through,
He might remark, with perfect truth,
"This hurts me worse than you."

THE WAG

He laughed best who laugheth last,
So on the mundane ball,
The dog, who chuckles with his tail,
Must laugh the best of all.

—You'll ultimately want a Steinway Piano—in the meantime be protected

Every piano purchaser sees the time when they wish they had bought a Steinway.

After the bill has been paid, after the piano has become a fixture in the household, after the years have passed and the volume wanes and the weaknesses begin to show, invariably the purchaser wishes they'd paid a little more and bought a Steinway.

It is inevitable.

It happens every time.

There is no question but that every true lover of piano music ought to have a Steinway just as every exponent of the violin ought to have a genuine Stradivarius.

If a musician cannot have the instrument that best interprets the music that fills his very soul it is indeed a pity.

But many cannot afford such instruments.

Many have to get along with cheaper pianos simply because they haven't the money to buy a Steinway.

They know they'll wish they'd bought a Steinway, but rather than have no piano at all they buy a $200 or $300 instrument as a temporary expedient.

Here is the danger point!

The danger is in where they go to buy this temporary piano.

Do they go to the Steinway dealer or do they go where (when they are ready to discard the cheaper piano for a Steinway) they cannot get a Steinway?

Remember this—you cannot trade an old piano for a new Steinway anywhere in this city except at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s. No one else is allowed to handle new Steinways. If we find that your cheaper piano was purchased of us (within three years of the time you came to trade it in for a Steinway) we allow you every cent you paid on the purchase price. You don't lose a nickel if the cheaper piano originally came from us.

In other words—any one purchasing a piano of us may exchange it for a new Steinway at any time within three years. We simply send out the Steinway whenever you say and take back the other piano, transferring to your credit all you've paid on the cheaper piano over to the new Steinway account.

Our only stipulation is that this cheaper piano must have been bought of us, otherwise we will only do as any other dealer would do —simply allow you what it is worth, irrespective of what it cost you.

So you see the wisdom of purchasing your $200 or $300 piano here. It is simply insurance against a loss that otherwise is bound to come, for you'll want a Steinway some day just as sure as anything.

Jerome and the Mob

Striking exemplification of the fickleness of public opinion is to be found in the case of District Attorney Jerome of New York. For some years Mr. Jerome enjoyed a good deal of spectacular popularity, and at one time there was a fair prospect of his becoming Governor of New York. He was regarded as a man of admirable mental poise and exceptional mental stamina. So great was the confidence reposed in him by the public, so powerful the magnetism of his personality, that he could afford to defy and reprobate the most autocratic of political bosses. Few idols of the American people have excited their constituents to the degree of rapturous devotion that Mr. Jerome enjoyed during the period of his apotheosis. In those halcyon days the District Attorney heard nothing but diapasons of enthusiastic regard, he inhaled nothing but the incense of devotion; from all sides came assurances of fealty and forecasts of greater triumphs. In time there came the inevitable reaction that every popular hero must experience. The fever reached its height, the subsidence was rapid, the spell wore off. When Jerome refused to prosecute the magnates of the big insurance companies whose commercial dishonesty had been clearly proved at the legislative investigation conducted by the man who is now Governor of New York, the District Attorney lost his hold on the imagination of the mob. Charges were preferred against him, and though they were not sustained, he was not reinstated in public favor. At a public meeting some weeks ago the audience, a typical democratic mob, attempted to hiss him off the platform, but he stood his ground and begged his boorish American fellow citizens to hear him. Put to shame, with belated magnanimity they consented to take testimony, and thereupon Jerome set forth his defense against the aspersions that had been cast upon him, and succeeded in bringing conviction to the minds of his hearers. At the end of the speech the audience cheered. As a result of this spectacular triumph Mr. Jerome has again been deemed worthy of the pedestal from which he was but recently toppled, and the other night a banquet was given in his honor and he was belauded by some of the great men of the metropolis. Once more his ears are titillated with words of cheer and apparently he is to have another inning.

The People's Thirst

It is not unusual for the people to make amends to heroes who have suffered injustice at their hands, but it has been the misfortune of many an ill-requited hero to die before the people became sensible of their grievous errors of judgment. The people are not so much to blame as the demagogues by whom they are misled. Jerome himself touched on this point at the banquet in his honor. "The public is always inclined to be just," he said, "though it is often misled or misinformed." He went on to explain that when the insurance cases were under discussion the truth was never told to the people. "They observed a lack of decency in commercial matters," he said, "and they conceived this lack of decency to be larceny; they did not realize that nothing is a crime in this State which is not described between the covers of the statute books. But they were incensed. Those learned pundits, the editorial writers, who dispose of any and all subjects with equal facility, clamored for a sacrifice. They wanted blood. They wanted a rich man put in jail. They talked about dummy directors, but there is nothing in the law which says it is a crime to be a dummy director. The people were misled, however, and were made to believe that everything that is wrong is a crime and I was expected to do wrong to gratify their passions." These are words which might be pondered to advantage by many good citizens of this city in whom a burning thirst for a sacrifice was artfully developed a few years ago. The wrongs committeed by insurance sharks in New York were much worse than some for which men have been indicted in San Francisco. It was wrong to employ Abe Ruef as an attorney as he was a disreputable practitioner who, in many instances, sold his services for evil purposes. But it was not generally supposed, nor is it a fact, that Abe Ruef bribed the supervisors with every fee that he received. Moreover in some instances the fees that he received were extorted, and the power of extortion that he exerted was put in his hands by the people of this city who were under no misapprehension when they vested him with his iniquitous prerogative. Nevertheless our District Attorney did not differentiate wrongs and crimes. Nay, in some instances he procured the indictment of men for crimes who had not even done wrong. He did worse than that: he turned over his office to an unscrupulous cabal that gave immunity to crooks, throttled justice and employed judges in the execution of their abominable designs. Here, too, the people have thirsted for a sacrifice; public judgment has been darkened by duplicity and confused by cant, but symptoms of the awakening are perceptible, the reaction is inevitable. The Calhoun trial which has served above all things to demonstrate the insincerity of the prosecution and the amazing and shameless loyalty of the most courageous of all its unblushing puppets, has proved an eye-opener to the purblind, a curative agency for the myopic.

The Desirable Bonded Debt

Wise men of humorous equipment, unburdened with taxable property, are having their emotions tickled while watching with affectionate and grateful interest developments in the somewhat thrilling campaign for more bond issues. Nothing so diverting, nothing half so inspiring from the standpoint of the care-free citizen has been pulled off in this city since the memorable campaign for mayor when Adolph Sutro and Dr. O'Donnell were rival candidates. A considerable part of the interest that attaches to this campaign is due to the noisy anxiety of grouchy citizens who find it somewhat difficult to pay their taxes. With the dollar limit already suspended, they are in a state of nervous apprehension over the prospect of an increase of the bonded debt so large that it may cause them to be taxed out of their homes. Apparently they are insensible of an economic fact universally recognized—that high taxes cheapen real estate. Now when real estate is cheap rents are low, and when rents are low it is of no advantage to a man to own a home. In the circumstances these grouchy citizens are clearly unreasonable. They should hearken to the wisdom of editors whose utterances breathe a lofty moral enthusiasm and scorn of mollycoddles. This is a rich city, rich beyond the dreams of avarice. Its future is not to be affected by silurians. In our eagerness to make it a great city more beautiful than the most populous and richest cities in the world we may retard its growth by living so far beyond our means as to impose terrifying burdens on our taxpayers, but we are determined to have the satisfaction of vindicating our esthetic-ism and our civic pride.

Citizen Easy Mark

Much of the interest that attaches to this bond campaign is due to the horrendous hullabaloo that has been raised by the prophets of public purity who are preaching the sonorous gospel of higher taxes and municipal fads and fancies. It is edifying and instructive to observe their tactics. They are repeating the old story upon which we have been regaled for some years without exhausting our patience or our capacity for assimilation. It is the story of capitalistic wickedness, a story that was old in San Francisco more than a decade ago when Henry Huntington abandoned us in disgust and took his millions to Los Angeles to assist in the development and enrichment of that favored territory. The ranters of righteous recrimination are once again employing their favorite style of argument. Everybody that opposes any one of the bond issues is denounced as the servile tool of a public service corporation. There is nothing so effective as this method of campaigning. There are many thousands of citizens in this city who live permanently in the intellectual age of the young men's debating society, and their faith never gives way to cynicism. Most of them are doctors, young lawyers fresh from college and office clerks, men of very high, of almost impossible, ideals with respect to almost everything but their own personal conduct. Of the mainsprings of public movements, of the motives of the cliques and factions that give zest to public life, they are as ignorant as a hog is of the precession of the equinoxes. Yet you can hear them discussing public affairs dogmatically and fervidly in the street cars every day. These men, who are always susceptible to the overtures of duplicity, especially the non-property owners among them, have probably been convinced ere this that all the public service corporations in town are opposing the civic center project from sinister motives. The last thing in the world likely to occur to them is that real estate speculators have banded themselves together and subsidized the bawds of daily journalism for selfish purposes to be satisfied at the expense of the city. Far be it from them to stiffen their credulity against the sophistical subtleties and plausible preachments of the little band of outcast millionaires who are stimulating factional strife in this city, intent upon getting hold of all available public utilities. If they took note the other day of the organization of a new gas company by the Spreckels brothers, it is hardly likely that the significance of it cast any translucent beams into their adolescent intelligence. The probability is that they have been satisfactorily impressed with the municipal railroad project which is destined, under the sagacious management of the Troys, the Connollys and the Murphys, to crystallize into a fatal blow to the United Railroads. We have heard that in the thirty-ninth district, if nowhere else, there is absolute confidence in the business sagacity of the men who required nearly three years to determine what should be done with the wrecked hall—whether it should be torn down or repaired—and who scattered the departments of the city government all over town for the benefit of landlords and for the distribution of the coin of the indulgent taxpayers. The thirty-ninth district enjoys almost a monopoly of that smug stupidity which is recognized as one of the essential ingredients of every community, and thence come all the leading proponents of the bond issues, civic patriots who are in favor of experimenting with a municipal railroad under the management of those commercial geniuses at the City Hall who haven't yet learned how the last defalcation in the treasury occurred. The thirty-ninth district is probably the reason why our Charter doesn't contain a provision similar to the one in the Constitution of the State of New York, which forbids the submission of more than one financial item to the people in any year.

Is it a "Square Deal?"

Governor-General Smith of the Philippines has returned to the United States on a six-months leave of absence and says that he does not expect to go back. Governor Smith is a San Franciscan and he will probably resume his residence here. After eleven years' faithful service the Governor-General gives an account of his stewardship and it is a clean record of close attention to duty, strict adherence to the principles of justice and honest dealing, and capable performance of the tasks, oftentimes onerous and generally thankless that came to his hand. It is not the fault of Governor Smith that conditions in our far away dependency are less prosperous than they should be, or that the maintenance of our sovereignty is a constant drain on the American people. But he might have been more frank in his statement concerning those conditions than he seems to have been in his first talk with the newspapermen after landing on American soil. He told the reporters that conditions in the Philippines were good, but he would not say that they were prosperous. It was hardly to be expected, he said, that a country which was involved in warfare for thirteen years can recover in three or four. That is true, but how much easier it could have been made for the Filipinos if we as their masters had dealt fairly with them in the matter of giving them a market for the products of their industry. No doubt Governor Smith will offer plausible arguments to show that our policy of trade repression was a good one. He is himself a part of that policy and it would not do to comment critically upon that which the administration at Washington has pronounced good. Still, to the mind of the ordinary citizen it does not seem that the people of the Philippines have

The Little Chorus Singer

From the German of Gabriele Reuter

"Just look at that little chorus singer! How earnest he is in his work—how realistic his every movement—"

"You mean Schachtschabel?" asked the other, a merry smile breaking the seriousness with which he had listened to the music. "Of course, who wouldn't notice Schachtschabel! Now, could you believe it, that man's great ambition is to sing a leading part—preferably Lohengrin?"

"What? That little old—" the stranger chuckled. A warning hiss sounded from behind him, and he took up his glass to look more closely at the little singer.

The man in question stood a pace or two apart from the main body of the male chorus, for, old and withered and grey as he was, he had won the position of leader, Not because of volume of voice or commanding presence, but because of his longer term of service and a certain surety of precision in holding the key and the time.

The good little Court Theatre was kind to its faithful servants and honored old tradition. Not even the duke himself could imagine a performance of "Lohengrin" without Schachtschabel. For they two, and the sweet old lady in a front row seat, with her silver hair and her white shawl, were almost the only people left who could remember the very first performance of "Lohengrin" in this theatre. It was many years ago now, that time when the light of Wagner's genius was breaking over Germany—a strange and brilliant star, which most people thought only the meteor of a moment.

The old lady in the front row seat, at that time young and very beautiful, had sung Elsa. She was Schachtschabel's first love. Mad, wild jealousy of the blonde giant Lohengrin had raged in his heart throughout the performance. Schachtschabel himself was then only a very young and very foolish novice, who had but recently fled from his father's carpenter shop to seek fame and fortune on the stage. Life shone bright with hope for him then, hope as fair as blossoms in May. Why shouldn't he become leading tenor in time? He knew his Goethe, and he knew what makes an artist—"a heart swelling to emotion's power." Goethe didn't say a word about height of stature, or even about volume of voice. Voices can be cultivated anyway—but the heart, the temperament, the power to feel emotion—that must be born in one, and that was the one important thing in art.

And when the tall messenger of the Grail bent his stately head over the beautiful maiden, and sang softly, amid an awed silence in the house—"Elsa, I love thee," then Schachtschabel's heart gave a mighty bound, and the thrill of a solemn vow shook his entire being. "In two years more, I will stand there—I will draw Elsa to my breast—I, Schachtschabel, will sing—'Elsa, I love thee!'"

Twenty-five years passed and saw Schachtschabel still in the chorus, and now he was nearing the fiftieth anniversary of his entrance into service. In all these weary years he had not achieved the fulfilling of his ambition to sing a leading role, not even for a single evening.

His judgment of the various Intendants was based entirely on their attitude toward this, his heart's desire. The first had encouraged him to study, telling him that it all depended on command of technical skill. "Technique does it, Schachtschabel—technique is the whole thing. Keep at it faithfully—in a year or so you may be ready—we'll see—"

The second had patted him cordially on the shoulder and explained to him how very important a person the leader of the chorus was. It was easy enough to pick up leading tenors, but unless Schachtschabel could find a man as reliable as himself to lead the chorus, he, the Intendant, would not take the responsibility of letting Schachtschabel leave his place to sing Lohengrin.

Then there came a new Intendant. This one listened with a scornful smile, and finally interrupted him crossly. He said that a man who didn't reach even the military standard in height, and had an impediment in his speech besides, ought to be thankful to get a position at all.

Schachtschabel did not like this new Intendant. When the singers made invidious remarks about their chief, the old man would nod solemnly, and lay his thin hand mysteriously on his breast as if to hide a secret which lay there—a secret which, should he but reveal it, could seriously imperil the position of the Intendant. But he continued to suffer in silence. The long years of waiting had drawn a dull veil of sadness over his eyes. They were like a room made ready for a guest who does not come, where finally a delicate grey dust-cloud settles on everything, dimming all the objects that had once shone so brightly.

He was too short; he had not even the height required by the very lowest military standard. The gay mantles had to be hemmed up to fit his meager little figure, and the helmets were lined with cotton to prevent them from slipping over his face. But his soul was of heroic stature, glowing in the fire of tribulation, struggling for expression it could not find.

Old Schachtschabel would get very angry when he heard the tenor and the baritone exchanging stories in the wings, while waiting for their cues. They seemed so indifferent to their glorious roles, pouring out their beautiful voices as carelessly as young colts neighing to the morning breeze. His voice had neither the sweetness nor the fulness of theirs; malicious spirits feigned to notice a slight impediment in his speech. But what did such superficialities mean, after all? Did he not feel all the more deeply the majesty and beauty of genius? His wan, wrinkled little face mirrored all the emotions that should have moved the souls of the heroes in the immortal works he lived through daily. And then the stage manager would come with warning shout: "Schachtschabel, don't stand so near the footlights! Schachtschabel, don't gesticulate so, you are attracting attention!"

But at home, with his old mother, he was lord indeed. There were no Intendants and no stage managers here, in the two little back rooms on the upper floor of an old house, where he lived with the aged widow. Here Schachtschabel could talk as freely as he wished. Here he could give utterance to caustic criticism of newly engaged singers, of newly performed operas. He would tramp about the little room on his short legs, waving his arms in heroic gesture, singing and reciting, until his patient old mother shrank behind her coffee pot, frightened at the glare of his eyes.

Schachtschabel became an authority in his little circle. The neighbors would come to consult him about buying a gallery ticket for the newest opera. For he knew much more about it than did the singers, who saw only their own parts. Schachtschabel was engaged to copy out the scores and roles, and felt the responsibility keenly.

He would sit there writing hour after hour, wrapped in his old grey dressing-gown, alone in silence and darkness, in the pale ring of light from the little lamp. A sip of coffee now and then kept his spirits up. The orchestra parts, the melodies and leit-motives began to take on life and sound before his inner ear—he saw the singers on the stage, heard the expression of their passion in the duets, the recitatives and coloratures. Then a sudden energy would come over him, an uncanny wave

Jordan's Absurd Apology

When Schoolmaster David Starr Jordan is abroad things happen—to Jordan. As has been related in the daily press the pundit of Stanford was called a liar by Professor Foulet of Bryn Mawr because Dr. Jordan declared in a loud voice and from a manuscript written in the fierce light of midnight oil, that France is a decadent nation. Now comes Dr. Jordan with rebutting testimony corroborated by his own authority insisting that his remarks were "misinterpreted"; that he did not say France was a decadent nation, but that he meant to be understood as saying that wars had so depleted the best blood of France that—like all other warring nations—she is not now what she would have been if all that brawn, blood and brains had been permitted to perpetuate its several strains unto succeeding generations of Frenchmen. It won't do doctor; what you meant to say and what you intended should be understood from what you did say, are corollaries entirely aside from the circumstance. You did say that France was a decadent nation, and if Professor Foulet had not called you a liar you would yourself have "misinterpreted" your own language as it was "misinterpreted" by every intelligent person within sound of your loud voice. A "regrettable incident" indeed, as you say; and all the more regrettable since, lacking the courage of your conviction, you hedge and skulk behind the umbrageous boskage of your sophistical verbiage. It is not gladsome to the heart of your admirers, doctor, to hear you thus stultify your long-acquired reputation for precision of diction and accuracy of terms. The word "decadent" means just what it says, and nobody is better aware of that meaning than yourself. You do not deny that you used the word; but you seek to distort the etymology of the word. You did say that France is decadent, and there is not a freshman at Stanford that is not familiar with the only definition of the adjective. You did say that France was decaying or already decayed—I will allow you the benefit of the doubt and let you save yourself as far as possible by revising your apology in words as follows, to wit: "I did not intend to be understood as charging that France is a hopelessly decadent nation now; but I do wish to be understood as saying that France is decadent—that she is in process of decay consequent upon the loss of her best blood in the wars she has fought for despotism and liberty." You may reconstruct your Bryn Mawr speech, doctor, as I have here suggested; but please do not insult our intelligence by insisting that we have "misinterpreted" your meaning and intention.

Characteristic Behaviour

It is apparent that President Jordan is not a controversialist. He is distinctly a schoolroom dogmatist with a hobby that he is riding to death. With a mind stored with the results of superficial thought and investigation he flatters himself that his is the privilege of comprehending the mysteries of the natural world, and when he imagines that he is spouting truisms he is only uttering fantastic nonsense. The fact is that President Jordan has a habit of enlarging to excess things which fall in with his preconceived notions, and at the same time he is utterly without that comprehensive grasp which reduces the intricate skein of causes and events to a single thread. What he has been saying about France has been said at different periods in the history of Christian civilization about every nation in Europe. There has been deterioration in every modern nation and there has been renascence, the seeds of which are not progagated on scientific principles. But Jordan being a scientist is convinced that mankind are governed on principles which have been grasped and expounded by science. However, there was no necessity of his retiring helter-skelter from his position. A skilled controversialist would have stood to his guns and put the enemy to route. But Jordan is too amiable. In this Foulet-Jordan "affaire," as they would call it in Paris, the President of Stanford University behaved just as he did on another occasion when his utterances involved him in trouble. When he was quoted some years ago as saying that President Roosevelt in conversation with him had referred to McKinley as a jelly-fish President he repudiated the interview.

What Balzac Thought of His Countrymen

When Professor Foulet called President Jordan a liar there was a fine chance for a controversy which a skilled controversialist would have relished. The skilled controversialist would have politely informed Professor Foulet that in alluding to the French as a decadent people he was but reinforcing his own conclusions with the dicta of some of the most eminent sons of France. Doubtless the impetuous professor would characterize this assertion as a lie, whereupon the skilled controverialist would quote Balzac. "What is the France of 1840?" asked Balzac in his introduction to Catherine de Medici, and Balzac himself made reply: "A country occupied exclusively with material interests—without patriotism, without conscience; a nation which egoism will some day deliver over to invasion." Incidentally the skilled controversialist would be inclined to confound and confuse the learned and suave Professor Foulet with one of Balzac's epigrams, one that even so learned a man as this schoolmaster who is coming out to enlighten Berkeley might have some difficulty in surpassing: "When men are strong they do not fear to admit their weakness."

What France Says About France

But perhaps Professor Foulet would condescend to discuss the matter. Perhaps he would say that since the invasion which Balzac so accurately predicted the French people had been steadily improving. Then would the skilled controversialist confound him with a few choice sentiments from one of the recent works of M. Anatole France, a gentleman and a scholar who is very much beloved by this generation in France, who, in his political writings, is said to be one of Voltaire's most ardent disciples, and who is pleased to be regarded as "a valiant warrior in the war of humanity." In his "L'Ile des Pingouins" we find France gibbeting the frailties of his countrymen for the entertainment of the rest of mankind. His type of a modern French politician is a man whose wife is engaged in amorous intrigues. He dwells with bitter satire on the disastrous results to French civilization of unrestrained materialism and the pursuit of wealth. He ridicules the ideas and methods of the politicians of today and reproaches modern society for its immorality. In the last chapter is painted in striking colors the awful results of industrial competition unrelieved by sentiment, religion or high ideals. He says that the State is planted on respect for the rich and contempt for the poor and that feeble spirits take refuge in a hypocrisy which no one can condemn because it contributes to the maintenance of order and the stability of public institutions. Even Dr. Jordan is less strongly convinced of the decadence of France than M. Anatole France, but perhaps Professor Foulet has already put M. Anatole France out of business by denouncing him as a liar. What that eminent sociologist, Dr. E. Robeson Taylor, thinks of M. Anatole France I have never heard, but it doesn't matter much. Dr. Taylor's argument in support of France is irrefutable: "I found a French poet whose poetry was worth translating; ergo, abracadabra."

The Jordan Spectacle

This Foulet-Jordan affaire is such a fructiferous topic that I hate to let go of it. I have enjoyed the affaire immensely; especially have I enjoyed the discomfiture and the routing of the eminent pundit of Palo Alto, who is not less noted for the pleasure which he derives from congealing the spirits of ebullient youth than from the triumphs which he has scored in all controversies with the student body. By this affaire it has been signally shown that Dr. Jordan is very much in the nature of a bluff. In the classroom he is invulnerable, but removed from the seat of his authority he is as timid as a shrinking co-ed fresh from the most remote of pastoral regions. A dogmatist in the academic atmosphere, when challenged abroad he hasn't the courage of his hoariest platitudes, nor the resourcefulness of an amateur debater of the Chautauqua circle. The decadence of France is a matter on which all university professors are agreed. It is quite possible that France is not at all decadent, but the schoolmasters are convinced that it is, and what they mean by decadence is what Dr. Jordan meant by it—a decline in force or excellency. And the average schoolmaster, if his views were to be challenged, would be ready to defend them. He would not expose himself as Jordan has done to the charge that he lacks the power to express accurately what he conceives, for lack of this power denotes inaccuracy in the conception itself.

His Honor Will Probably Tell Us

Mayor Taylor has been talking a good deal lately. He talked fore and aft at the presentation of the Jusserand medal and he made two speeches at the Jusserand banquet; that's four, count 'em. His honor also delivered an oration at Los Angeles on some occasion the incentive of which I have forgotten. Then he was one of the talkers at the Raphael Weill banquet to the "Old Guard" of the Bohemian Club; and there are several other speeches reported by the press the provocation of which has escaped my memory. Moreover, the end is not yet, the Portola festival comes on apace and much is to be talked about in the meantime. In truth Mayor Taylor has assumed a sort of proprietary interest in Portola and all that appertains to his festival. If there is anything to be said concerning the old adventurer and his memorable exploit it will be said by Mayor Taylor who seems to know more in a general way about this subject than anybody else, and that is not saying much, for nobody seems to be familiarly conversant with the details of the discovery of this peninsula and the bay of San Francisco. Even Mayor Taylor has not yet solved some of the historical doubts of that event. I wish his honor would look up the data and in some speech to be delivered tell us authoritatively whether old Gaspar came in through the Golden Gate or approached the site of our city from the southward overland. I had myself supposed that the route of Portola on his way to discover the bay of San Francisco was through Pescadero and Palo Alto, but I read the other day in the Call's answers to correspondents that he is "alleged to have sailed through the Golden Gate." It is significant that even the wise man of the Call is not sure of it. I hope, therefore, that Mayor Taylor will find out about it before we celebrate the event. It does not seem possible that the Spaniard could have marched to his great discovery by land and at the same time voyaged thereto by sea. The responsibility of putting us right on this matter seems to lie exclusively with Mayor Taylor than whom there is no better source of information once it is established. We certainly ought to know something definite concerning that which we are about to celebrate. It therefore behooves Mayor Taylor to be up and doing as well as to be always up and saying. Eloquence is all right in its place, and the eloquence of Mayor Taylor is usually in the right place; but as there is a time to every purpose under the heaven; a time to be born, and a time to die; a time to plant and a time to pluck up that which is planted; a time to kill and a time to heal; a time to weep and a time to laugh; a time to mourn and a time to dance; a time to embrace and a time to refrain from embracing; a time to rend and a time to sew; a time to keep silence and a time to speak; so there is a time when it is more to the purpose aforesaid that the speech of our orators should be pregnant with facts and fecund of that which is instructive and edifying. Speaking for myself I am free to declare that I do not care to go into this Portola business blindly; I want to know beforehand what I am celebrating; if it is a discovery by land I desire to have that fact settled beyond the peradventure of a doubt; if it was a discovery by sea, that fact must be demonstrated before I can commemorate conscientiously. I depend on Mayor Taylor to guide me aright in this matter by first proving to me that Gaspar de Portola discovered the bay of San Francisco and then putting me wise as to the real historical dope.

"Martial Law" at McCloud

The proverbial fuss and feathery disposition of the tin soldiery was well exemplified in the occupation of the lumber camp of McCloud by the militia. A lot of Italian lumbermen employed by the Sierra Lumber Company struck and organized themselves into a mob. The superintendent of the lumber mills, John H. Queal, called upon Sheriff Howard of Siskiyou County to protect the property of the company. Sheriff Howard gathered a posse and went to the camp, looked over the situation, found it "threatening," looked at his posse and found it inadequate, and in his turn called on the Governor for aid. The Governor detailed Colonel Albert Bradbury of the State troops to "look over the situation." Colonel Bradbury went to McCloud, looked over the situation, and reported it extremely threatening. Thereupon Governor Gillett dispatched two companies of militia. Immediately upon the arrival of the soldiers Superintendent Queal declared himself in a state of siege and the lumber camp under martial law. All of which is very funny, including the indorsement of Superintendent Queal's state of siege and martial law, by Adjutant-General Lauck. Upon what meat does this Queal feed that he has grown great enough to put a section of the sovereign commonwealth under martial law? And by what sort of interpretation of the statutes providing for the organization and maintenance of a military force by the State of California is Adjutant-General Lauck empowered to indorse and authorize the martial law declared by Citizen Queal? Let the members of the State Board of Strategy answer that question—it is beyond my knowledge of the law, and it is entirely out of all my experience in real wars on several continents. However, it is pleasant to learn that Superintendent Queal's martial law was knocked into a cocked hat by Reporters Healey and Gray of the Globe and Examiner. It happened that under the Queal dispensation all telegrams were subject to censorship by Queal or Lauck. Acting upon orders from Queal the telegraph operator at McCloud passed one of Gray's telegrams to Lauck for inspection, and stopped sending one of Healey's dispatches after he had transmitted about half of it. Then Healey and Gray went to Adjutant-General Lauck and told him in effect that he didn't know the rules of war from the rules of ping-pong, and that if he didn't stop Queal from meddling with matters that were of no concern to him, there would be trouble in that troubled camp surpassing any then in process. Lauck came to his senses with alacrity and Queal was relegated to his ordinary vocation of bossing the destiny of his mill by a dam site. Thus were the strained relations between the army and the press relieved by the shirt sleeves diplomacy of the newspaper reporters. But it is possible that the telegraph operator at McCloud will lose his job. Beneath the rule of men entirely great the pen is mightier than the sword. Behold the arch-enchanter's wand!—itself a nothing!—but taking sorcery from the master-hand to paralyze the Caesars—and to strike the loud earth breathless!—Take away the sword—States can be saved without it!

Heney for District Attorney

Francis J. Heney has announced that if no better man is named as a candidate for the office of District Attorney he will himself put on the sandals and make the running. This announcement, considering the importance of it, was received, it pains me to say, with an indifference bordering on apathy. Mr. Heney and his friends had reason to expect something in the nature of a public demonstration in attestation of the gratitude that ought to have been stirred in the expansive and sensitive popular heart by so exhilarating a proclamation. The only hypothesis upon which the singular composure of our volatile community is to be accounted for is that the announcement was not unexpected. With the utmost deference to Mr. Heney it may be said that there is much in the record of his strenuous career to warrant the suspicion that he is a congenital tax-eater. Much the greater part of the fees that he has earned as a lawyer came from the capacious pockets of the generous and grateful people. For if not a patriot for revenue only Mr. Heney's patriotism is stimulated by the coin of the realm. Add together all the fees that Mr. Heney ever received in private practice including even the one from the Contra Costa Water Company taken at the face of the receipt which bears his signature and the total will not equal one-half the sum of the fees that have been paid by a grateful Government. Now, to Mr. Heney the future, so far as private practice is concerned, must look even more barren than the past. In this circumstance alone Mr. Heney would be justified in motiving the determination to succeed the incredible Mr. Langdon.

Qualifications and Inducements

If for no other reason than that the election of Mr. Heney would mean the exit of Mr. Langdon he should be urged to run. The manipulator of the marionette is superior to the puppet. I hope Mr. Heney will run if for no other reason than to make it clear even to the cynics that he is willing to sacrifice his pecuniary interests for the dear people. For if elected Mr. Heney will unquestionably refuse to permit Mr. Spreckels to pay his office expense, which, I believe, are higher than the salary of the District Attorney. Accepting this money for office expenses is a questionable practice from an ethical standpoint, if not from that of the criminal code, even in an assistant district attorney who is assigned to the prosecution of only those cases in which the man who pays the expenses is personally interested. As District Attorney Mr. Heney would scorn to touch the Spreckels largess. The pride of the more exalted station, if nothing else, would temper his cupidity. Therefore in all the circumstances of the matter it is perfectly safe to urge Mr. Heney to run for the job. Mr. Heney will animate an otherwise sedate campaign. He will enthuse the groundlings and mayhap the higher-ups who are not half so hostile to this pugnacious and pungent personality as some people imagine. There are only two convictions standing and neither was procured by Mr. Heney. So why should the higher-ups regard him with disfavor! As for the dear people, who flatter themselves that they are sporadically wise—they just dote on Mr. Heney.

The Barking Dog May Bite

It came to the knowledge of Earl Rogers the other day that John H. Helms, the Burns sleuth whom the lawyer had charged in open court with perjury had been making threats of reprisal to be consummated after the Calhoun case shall be closed. Somebody suggested to Rogers that the old proverb of barking dogs might be applicable in the case of Helms; but Rogers demurred to the infallibility of the adage and related the story of "Windy" Smith, the Wells Fargo shotgun messenger. "Windy" Smith was in the employ of the express company at a time when train robbers were numerous, active and quite successful all along the route between Colton and Yuma. Usually the robbers "got the drop" on the train men and a threat to dynamite the express car invariably brought the messenger to terms of capitulation. This sort of thing did not seem to suit "Windy" Smith who was loud in his denunciation of the men who so easily responded to the demands of the robbers. "I'll bet they'd get what was coming to them if they ever tackled my car," was the magnificent boast of "Windy" Smith; and wherever he uttered this challenge the folk laughed and "guessed 'Windy' was only jawing for his job." The old proverb was freely quoted even in the presence of Smith who was a good natured person and not prone to take offense at the jests and jibes of his friends. So it ran along until one night as the train carrying "Windy" Smith and an unusually fat treasure was crossing the Mojave desert and three men crawled over the caboose down upon the engineer. The hold up was well planned and would have been successfully executed if it hadn't been for the obstinacy of "Windy" Smith and the rapid fire of his shotguns. One of the robbers bit the dust; another clawed around in the desert until the train hands loaded him into the baggage car; and the other went away on his mustang and has not been "met up with" since. After that people didn't laugh or jeer when "Windy" Smith boasted of his prowess or told what he would do in sudden emergencies of peril. "So I am a little in doubt," Rogers commented, "about the validity of that proverb. Barking dogs do sometimes bite, and if "Windy" Smith should say that he intended to do me up I should go heeled until something serious had happened to 'Windy' Smith."

Jones—I can't understand why you have rented an apartment at the crossing of two trolley lines. The noise is deafening.

That Press Club "Ladies' Night"

The Press Club gave a ladies' night last Saturday. Time was when the mere announcement of a ladies' night at the Press Club would have been an item of unusual news; but this ladies' night is not here chronicled for any such reason. Be it known in passing that the newspapermen have become less niggardly than of yore in their attentions to the gentler sex and that the review of their social activities would bulge these limited paragraphs. There will be here no list of those present; no enthusiastic praise of the costumes of the beautiful women who filled the ball-room; no rapturous dwelling on the songs that were sung and the music of 'cello and violin and piano that made the mad hours after midnight glide on the wings of enchantment. I am not going to say so much as a word of the two Spanish musicians who seem to have come straight from the sultry plazas of Barcelona for the sole purpose of lifting a roomful of newspapermen and newspaperwomen to the topmost pinnacle of artistic excitation by the magic of their instruments. Go to; I have said too much of this already. I leave these things to the society reporters who will wake up some day and discover that they have been overlooking a fountainhead of social news in the Press Club.

The Ode to Tombstone III

But I have something to tell in connection with that ladies' night at the Press Club. Come closer. That's it; now I need not talk so loud. There was electricity in the air of the Press Club that ladies' night of a week agone. No, I don't mean the current of wit and badinage, of compliment and whispered words, that runs through all such gatherings when they are successful. I mean something entirely different. I mean the electricity that darts its forked arrows hither and thither, ready to shock nobody knows whom. There was discernible a nervous apprehension on the part of some of the ladies; a periodical hesitancy; a recurring catching of the breath, a coming and going of swift colors in soft cheeks; in a word, a most remarkable psychological condition. Strangely enough, it was more than counterbalanced, this feminine state of mind, by a sort of chuckling expectation, a condition as of awaiting something with inward laughter difficult to suppress, which manifested itself on the part of the men. What was it all about? It was all about THE ODE TO TOMBSTONE THE THIRD.

Evil to Him That—

Shall I quote the ode to you, you who have not been admitted within the sacred portals of the newspapermen's club with the consequent privilege of hearing it intoned? No, I don't think I shall. After all, it is a sacred thing, this glorification of the ebon-hued Press Club cat of graveyard name, and I dare not put it into cold print without the special permission of the board of managers of the club. And besides there is another reason, the same reason which generated electricity in the atmosphere of the Press Club. When Jack Wilson, poet laureate of the Press Club, applied himself to the composition of the ode to Tombstone III, he was splendidly endowed through painstaking observation of the cat, anatomical, physiological, medical, as well as psychological observation, for the celebration of his transcendent feline qualities. And he did it in verses that are crammed full of poetry for everybody who knows Tombstone. He did it with such thoroughgoing conscientious completeness, that even an amusing epochal episode in the early life of Tombstone was duly set forth in glowing numbers. 'Twas an episode on which I shall not dwell, though it was in no wise disgraceful to Tombstone, noble fellow that he is.

Will the Ladies Resent It?

Suffice it that Jack Wilson did no less justice to this peculiar part of Tombstone's history than to all others. And when Fletcher Tilton came to frame the hymnal words to fitting music, he surpassed his best previous efforts. Now, when the committee in charge of the Press Club ladies' night started to prepare a program of entertainment, somebody suggested that the ode to Tombstone III be sung by the club's quartet. Excellent idea; cried, one by one, George Van Smith, Edgar Reinhart and Wallie Young, the committee in charge. And then they paused and stammered. How about those few lines? Could they be sung before ladies? Now mark you, those lines are not naughty; far from it; the ode is conceived in a very serious vein. They are not vulgar; perish the thought. But they might, with the accent on the subjunctive, they might bring just a tinge of embarrassment to the feminine cheek. Then again they might not. It was a hard question to decide. The committee could not decide it. So it went abroad through the club and was argued pro and con, until there were two sides, those who insisted that the ode must be sung and those who insisted that it must not. Of course the ladies heard the discussion. They always do. It is not of record, however, that when the dispute was decided in favor of having the ode sung any ladies stayed away. They came in hundreds, fair, demure-looking, radiating that electricity to which I have referred.

The Prima Donna Read the Ode

Somehow or other it became known that a certain prima donna who was present and whose Junoesque figure and handsome face are known from one end of the country to the other, had been allowed to read and pass upon the mysterious ode in all its candid completeness. She became the cynosure of speculating feminine eyes, the subject of good-natured feminine whisperings. It is suspected that some even spoke to her about the thought that was in every woman's mind. Would it be advisable to stay? It is not of record that anybody left before the program of entertainment was completed. Were the ladies startled when the psychological moment arrived? Really, I have been altogether too garrulous and I shall not tell another word of what happened.

A Verdict Set Aside

In view of extraordinary current happenings it is singular that the daily papers should not think it worth while to call attention to the decision of our Supreme Court in the case of A. C. Deware who was convicted of burglary in Stockton. The decision was rendered Friday of last week. The verdict was set aside for no other reason than that at the trial of the case the Assistant District Attorney was guilty of misconduct prejudicial to the rights of the defendant. It does not appear that this zealous functionary did anything more than ask a few improper question designed to blacken the character of the defendant. He did not indulge in wholesale denunciation. He employed no invectives. He did not even call witnesses to give testimony respecting matters foreign to the issue. Nor was he encouraged by the trial judge when he asked the improper questions. On the contrary, instead of being eulogized he was rebuked, and yet the Supreme Court set aside the verdict. In view of current happenings it might be supposed that this decision is based on an entirely new interpretation of the law, but the fact is that the underlying principle is fundamental and has been frequently enunciated. Indeed, Justice Melvin, who wrote the opinion of the court, made reference to familiar precedent in this State, quoting the Supreme Court in the case of the People against Valliese, as follows: "Rebukes do not seem to have any effect upon prosecuting officers, and probably as little on juries. The only way to secure fair trials is to set verdicts so procured aside."

What the Court Said

This is what Justice Melvin said with reference to the misconduct of the prosecuting officer:

"Courts have exhibited a strong disinclination to set aside convictions upon the ground of misconduct of district attorneys. This is eminently proper. The State should not be put to the expense and its officers to the trouble of a new trial unless it clearly appears that the rights of a defendant have been invaded and a fair trial has been denied him, because of the behavior of the prosecution officer. But we cannot see how the highly improper conduct here revealed could fail to make its impression upon the minds of the jurors to the prejudice of defendant's rights. After persistently suggesting that for some reason defendant did not want the opinion of the chief of police of Green Bay, his former home, upon the subject of his general reputation for the moral qualities involved in the prosecution, the representative of the State of California asked this man on trial for his liberty, not if he had committed a similar crime to that for which he was being tried, not if he had been guilty of an ordinary offense (and such questions would have been very improper), but if he had not committed or attempted one of the most disgusting and atrocious crimes known. This was done after the court had ruled that the family relations of this man had nothing to do with the case on trial, and was followed by inquiries regarding the acquaintance of witness with another chief of police. It may be that the assistant district attorney showed no heat or malice in his manner, and that the jurors made no demonstration indicating that their passions were aroused against the defendant, but we cannot see how, in spite of the prosecutor's suavity, the apparent imperturbability of the jurors, and the court's prompt declaration of the law, such gross misconduct could fail to make its impression.

In view of the foregoing it must be apparent even to the dullest apprehension that a good deal of public money is wasted in this city by juridical officers. That it should be wasted through ignorance is incredible; to assume that it is wasted with sinister design would be to impute a crime of peculiar baseness and startling magnitude. And yet we have heard of prosecuting officers who have said: "If we cannot do it legally we'll make the people think we did."

The Passing of a Writer

Adeline Knapp who died on Sunday last at her home on the lower slope of Mount Tamalpais was the author of a number of books, as well as of short stories and magazine articles, widely varying in theme, and was one of the first to take up what is now termed "nature study." Her "Upland Pastures" has had a score of imitators. It had the unique experience of having been brought out in two separate editions de luxe, one by the East Aurora Association of Hubbard fame, and the other by the Tomoye Press of the Paul Elder Company. "The Well in the Desert," her last work of serious proportions, a novel with its scene laid in Arizona, attracted more attention than usually falls to the lot of a story too good to be a best-seller. "The Story of the Philippines" and "How to Live in the Philippines" both resulted from a visit to the archipelago suggested by the insular superintendent of public instruction in 1901. Miss Knapp had the most unique distinction in these days of being a woman of note without clamoring for the ballot for her sex. Many of the ardent suffragists attribute the defeat of the Equal Suffrage Bill in the last New York legislature to the able address which she delivered before that body. Though born in Buffalo, New York, it was in San Francisco that Miss Knapp began to write, and it is as a western writer that she is best known.

A Grotesque Allegory

On the fiftieth night of their sojourn the Queer Tourists again assembled in the Dire Necessity Inn to listen to the tale of one of their number. On this occasion it was up to the Finger of Scorn to entertain his fellow travellers, and he proceeded to do so. "I am a very poor raconteur," he began apologetically, "and my story is a short one. I hope that if it does not prove interesting, it will at least serve to point a moral as has each of the tales of my predecessors. As I understand it I am supposed to confine myself to the story of the circumstances that led to my present occupation. I will begin then by disclosing the identity of the man at whom Inexorable Fate commanded me to point for the remainder of the unfortunate one's days. Know then that he is a native of the city of Dreadful Feuds and was for a long time a member of the judiciary. There came before him one day a citizen charged with a heinous crime. The conviction of this citizen was demanded by the Overlord of the Community, a self-constituted official of great political power. For years he had been pursuing the defendant with bloodhounds, blacklegs and boodle and after many startling adventures he succeeded in getting his quarry before a judge in whom he had confidence that could not be shaken. The trial had scarcely been opened when this sublime confidence was so clearly vindicated that the defendant felt like the baseball team that has been matched against nine men and the umpire. But it soon became apparent that the evidence touching the crime was inadequate and unconvincing. The learned judge, however, ruled that if the defendant could not be found guilty of the crime charged it was more than possible that in trying to outmaneuver his enemies he had adopted the principle of fighting fire with fire, a species of turpitude defined in the code as infringement of copyright and generally recognized as a capital offense. The trial was a most tedious one and the testimony so confusing that the jury lost track of the issue and returned the following strange verdict: 'We the jury find the judge of this court guilty of the crime of underrating our intelligence.' Thereupon I, the Finger of Scorn, was assigned to the task of pointing at him exclusively."

A Theosophist Coming

Mrs. Annie Besant, the leader of Theosophic thought, is about to visit the Pacific Coast. This distinguished lady is "perfectly confident" that she has lived before and many times, though it is not on record that she makes claim to remembering precisely what station she occupied, much less which particular body as do the numerous claimants to the abandoned shell of Cleopatra, Mary, Queen of Scots and her gracious cousin the Good Queen Bess. "I would not use the word believe," she says, "rather, let me say I know I have lived before. You, for instance, would not say you believed you were a child at one time. You know that you were. So I say I have lived before. It is really a training of memory to understand that one has lived before. Some persons cannot remember back to their days of childhood, but with a little training they can go back a little farther, and by careful cultivation they are able to go back to a previous existence." Mrs. Besant heartily approves of the Rooseveltian diatribe against race suicide, though her argument is based not on the usual one of the need of population, nor even on the ethical family consideration but because it is wrong to set an artificial limitation on births when there are so many souls clamoring for reincarnation. She would, however, restrict the children of the poor where they are found unable to obtain sufficient physical and mental advantages. Mrs. Besant is a firm believer in the alliance between hypnotism and the theosophical belief and no doubt she will be able to shed light on the dark places. She is the author of several books relating to the mysteries and beliefs of her cult and was associated with Madame Blavatsky in her demonstrations of the wonders possible of performance to those of the advanced inner circle.

A Kithogue Compliment Righted

Some ungallant professor of something or other—the Unvarnished Verity, no doubt—has somewhere or other raised a cyclone in a wine cellar by fool-wise calling, not a lady a liar, but ladies in general liars. They, devotees of the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, who gossip as if under oath and speak but with the recording-angel in mind, whose one mission in life is to shame the devil and his minion man; they of thoughts ineffable and tongues to match, misunderstanding the nature of the kithogue compliment, and thereat taking umbrage, are naturally up in arms—not mine, alas! It was once my fate to hint to the most ladylike of ladies that she wasn't telling the exact truth. She didn't deny the soft impeachment, but advised me to ask Mama. I never forget her advice nor am I likely to forget it to my dying day; wherefore, before affirming, or rather confirming, the soft impeachment of the left-handed professor, let us ask Mama. What has the Great Mother to say for herself? This, that if ladies had invariably told the truth what time club-life was all the rage, none had lived to tell the tale today; that whereas they once lied for dear life in obedience to the first law of Nature and because of the literal club man held over their heads, they now lie indirectly for dear life, in obedience to the law of second nature and because of the metaphorical club of economic dependence. From Mama's point of view, lying, so far from being the Plutarchian "vice of the slave," is the virtue of the weak, the sin qua non of their existence. They who lied and weren't caught Lived. Truth tellers came to naught. To the Mother death is dark indeed and the lie for dear life white as they make 'em. Many a species that really ought to know better plays 'possum and possesses the land, shares with the righteous the inheritance of the earth. "Oh, my poor wing!" wails the mother partridge what time her bits o' babies pretend to be the dust they're in mortal danger of being turned into. The Arch Nature Fakir

The love-lure of a maiden's cheek,
Peach-bloom whereof the poets speak
  On soft skin like a soft snow flake
That takes the sun's kiss coldly meek,
  Is but a nature fake.

The lovely belladonna eyes
So full of toilet mysteries,
  Before which men unmarried quake,
Deep waters that reflect the skies,
  Are, too, a nature fake.

A woman's glory is her hair—
Departed, most of it, I swear,
  Dead glory, as of Greece. Just shake
The glory loose, unfillet—there!
  'Tis but a nature fake.

The beauty of a woman's breast
All tongues that are, or were, attest;
  And oh; for heads and hearts that ache
Than it not Heaven has sweeter rest!—
  No, never, nature fake?

The glad life-color of the lips,
The line of beauty of the hips—
  The more or less the fashions make—
And much my modest pencil skips—
  Naught, naught but nature fake.

If views of scientists be sound,
This earth's mere ellipsoidal ground;
  Love, art concealed for life's dear sake
The love that makes the world go round
  Is but a nature fake!

Boosters Off to Seattle

A party of one hundred Californians will leave San Francisco this week in the finest train that ever pulled out of California to visit the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition under the auspices of the California Promotion Committee, the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco and other organizations of the State. The prime object of the visit is to assist the exposition by spreading accounts of its attractions and unique features, and this will be accomplished when the party returns to California enthusiastic over what they have seen. It is for this reason that the visit has been planned almost at the opening of the fair, June fifteenth having been set aside by the management as "California Promotion Day." During their stay the Californians will be guests at a luncheon at the Exposition Club given by the Seattle Chamber of Commerce and the trustees of the exposition on the special day, and at a banquet on the following evening at the New Washington Hotel. The itinerary also includes a trip on Puget Sound in the steamer Kitsap, chartered for the purpose, with visits to Bellingham and Everett. At Tacoma the Tacoma Chamber of Commerce and the Board of Trade will be hosts. On the return trip eight hours will be spent at Portland, in connection with which the Portland Commercial Club has wired: "Will entertain party from arrival to departure." Ten-minute stops will be made at a number of Oregon and California cities. Sunday morning, June 25th, will find the California Hundred returned and ready to serve as individual publicity committees to demonstrate to the people of Seattle and Washington the willingness of California to do her utmost for the magnificent exposition of her northern neighbor. The commercial bodies of the city and State have worked as a unit in making the personnel of the delegation a thoroughly representative one, and the visit will forge another strong link in the chain which draws the people of the western country together.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks: The quiet of Wall Street for two months or more has been broken by heavy buying of leading stocks and great activity in the security list generally. These operations can be credited to influential banking interests that have given the crop outlook close scrutiny and found conditions favorable. In this factor lies the future prosperity of the country. We may look forward to the carrying out of important deals, readjustment of securities in leading rails and industrials which will be of material benefit to stockholders. Here is the basis for probably one of the greatest markets in stocks we have seen in Wall Street.

Wheat: Traders have had an eye-opener this week. While the bears have been laying their plans to force lower prices for all futures, the owners of cash wheat have gotten in touch with the biggest milling and consuming interests in the country. Possibly they have shaded prices a little on large lots, but at any rate they have hold of wheat in a way that is impressing. Several different day's shipping sales to outside milling points ranged from 125,000 to 200,000 bushels per day. Saturday's market was no exception when sales of 175,000 bushels were reported. The cash business for the week is well over 600,000 bushels. A leader in the cash trade declares that practically all the stocks will be sold and moved out before the new winter movement begins. Reports from Kansas and other points of the winter wheat belt are still conflicting. I estimate the total winter wheat yield for the year at 325,000,000 bushels. We believe the underlying conditions which have forced higher cash wheat prices will influence futures and that it is a buyer's market on all soft spots.

Cotton: The temper of the outside speculative public continues to be distinctly bullish, and for the time being at least weather developments have played into their hands. No sooner was the Texas drought condition relieved by copious rains all over the State than Mississippi, parts of Louisiana, Alabama and Tennessee were subjected to almost torrential rainfalls that were most unwelcome; those sections already having had ample moisture. The process of discounting the news took two directions. The simplest was that of allowing a big percentage for over-statement; the other accepted much of the damage but compared the area affected with the whole cotton producing belt and got a percentage of damage on the entire crop that was very small. These two processes account for some of the indifference with which the rain news was received by the regulars, when those who were in closer touch with actual conditions wondered why more attention was not given to careful statements of facts. A week of floods was the record at some points. From Vicksburg to Meridian, across the State of Mississippi and far over into Alabama and south to the gulf coast the rainfall was 5 to 15 inches in three days. The lowlands were flooded and uplands badly washed. Much replanting will be necessitated. Some crops have been lost entirely. Other fields have been made so wet that crab-grass will be well started ere cultivation can begin. With good weather henceforth the damage may be partially recovered but the rub comes here. The weather of the future may not be good; there is conceded some irreparable loss in Texas. Add to this the floods in Mississippi, Arkansas and Louisiana. A little later excessive rainfall in Texas is possible. July and August may be too dry, to say nothing of the destruction that will be wrought by boll weevils on account of the crop getting such a late start. Thus one by one the possibilities of damage are scored until a large crop seems impossible and even a moderate crop unlikely. It is therefore easily conceivable that the trade may become very sensitive to poor crop news. It is also well to remember that the stratum upon which the bullish feeling is based is the assumption that consumption in 1909-10 will be the largest the world has ever known owing to the increased number of spindles which have been built during the past year. This increase is said to mean an addition of 750,000 bales per annum to the world's consuming power and if normal conditions are restored and it now seems they surely will be, prices will naturally advance to such level as demand will accept.

The Exploiting of Hobart

Walter Hobart is under grave suspicion in Burlingame. He is suspected of having a press agent. On no other hypothesis can his friends account for the prompt publicity that is given to his doings nowadays. Apparently he has had a rush of limelight to the head. Why this repeated exploitation of Hobart? is the question asked in Burlingame. How is it that the escapades and eccentricities of Hobart are deemed worthy of publicity to the exclusion of the mad pranks of the other pungent personalities that contribute atmosphere to Burlingame? And why this revival of interest in Walter Hobart? These are the questions that are agitating society. I give them up. And yet I must confess that I am not without curiosity. In the old days when Walter Hobart was known as Prince Fortunatus, when he had money to throw to the birds and scattered it with a prodigal hand, his exploits were fast and furious and he was constantly in the public eye, but several years ago, in 1902, to be precise, when he had to give up his luxurious country home, and it was reported that his purse was well nigh empty, it was supposed that his passion for dazzling diversions had been assuaged. It seems to have been reborn.

A Secret Marriage

Society from Burlingame to Pacific Heights is all agog over the rumor that one of its pets has annexed a husband without publicity. Curiosity, whose other name is woman, is on the rampage demanding assuagement. Never was a more tantalizing rumor set afloat than this one which asserts that in our midst is a full-fledged married woman masquerading as a maiden. There is much that is done sub-rosa in society, but it has never been deemed prudent for a girl in the swim to forfeit engagement cups, wedding presents and spectacular ceremony. According to rumor the discovery of this secret marriage was made accidentally by a prominent matron who promised to keep her secret. She kept it to the extent of withholding the names of the bride and groom, and now everybody is guessing. I am told that the bride is not one of last season's debutantes; also, that the lady who has been most frequently mentioned by the guessers is one whose engagement has been the subject of rumor for more than a year.

Now For the Pantaloon Gown

The pantaloon gown is the very latest thing from Paris. It was shown in New York for the first time last week, and reports are that it was received with enthusiasm by those best competent to judge, the fair dames and damsels whose approval is relied upon for its introduction. They have pronounced it "beautiful in everything but name," and from the description vouchsafed us it must be at least interesting, if only for the same reason that Tommy's knickerbockers in "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch" are such a sensation in their small way, for the pantaloon effect is confined to the front elevation, while he who emulates Lot's wife and takes a peep over his shoulder will see a beautiful train sweeping along in the wake of its wearer with never a suspicion of bifurcation. It is a cross between a Louis XV and Dr. Mary Walker, with a suggestion of union suit, and is rather difficult to describe in words. The lower portion, skirt or trousers, as you please, is cut up the middle for about thirty-six inches, and the divided parts, draped around the legs like very loose and baggy trousers, have the effect of the divided skirts worn by women who ride astride. There is none of the exposure of hosiery that was one of the objections to the sheath gown, and even the homeliest of ankles are discreetly hidden from view. Below the knees the trousers are of broadcloth of the body of the gown but the upper portion is of silk, while, blended with this split portion is the gown proper with its train. Of course it does away with petticoats entirely, but apparently the other dainty fripperies are not barred, for we read of old lace garniture, embroidered panels, and buttons. It would seem to be the ideal combination for the militant suffragette, symbolical of all the rights and freedoms of mankind combined with the privileges of her own sex. One has a suspicion, though, that the effect of the pantaloon gown, displayed on the tall, stately, graceful models in the shops, and the same garment worn by the rotund, pudgy, duck-waddling elderly females who would be sure to get themselves up "in style" would be—well, different.

Miss Sears of Boston

Women of today are much more independent in the matter of dress than were their ancestors. A generation ago little girls were deterred from sports by the hint that their skirts made certain exercises impossible for them, and they meekly forebore to run, jump or play any games which demanded vigorous exertion. Today they decide that it is not the sport which is unseemly but the conventional costume, and forthwith they discard them skirts, tuck up their sleeves, do their hair in a "wad," and follow their inclinations. Miss Eleanor Sears, the Boston heiress, who achieved newspaperiety at Burlingame is the leader of the independent cult. It is a question whether she will lend herself to the compromise of a "pantaloon gown," for she frankly says: "If I want to wear men's costume, I do so." Miss Sears is an all-round athlete, and takes her sport quite seriously. She plays mannish games because she enjoys them, not as a fad or to ingratiate herself with any set, and if any woman has justified her right to wear what she pleases, it is herself. She plays tennis four hours on a stretch, is the champion swimmer and diver of New England, and can take a hand at baseball. She can ride any kind of a buck-jumper, and is an expert whip, driving tandem and four in hand. She can do anything with a yacht and is a great automobilist, not only competent to steer and drive the machine, but to tinker at its mechanism when it balks. Society down the peninsula seems never to be able to get over her appearance on the polo field togged out in regulation costume and ready for a game, but society soon becomes tolerant, and it need surprise no one if in another season or so women's polo teams are as much in favor as women's tennis and golf champions. Miss Sears can plead at least one justification for her masculine costume at masculine sports—she looks well in it. The same critics who are so exercised over her eccentricities of costume and manner spend a lot of their time in wondering that one so uneffeminate should have so many girl friends, forgetting that "All nature's difference keeps all nature's peace." External differences may cloak congenial mental characteristics. There is a story of an episode at Santa Barbara early in the year, when one day an auto came dashing up to the hotel entrance with Miss Sears alone on the back seat, her feet propped up beside the chauffeur. The vehicle waited before the hotel for some time, and the conventional tabby-cats peered and wondered who on earth Miss Sears could be calling for, when Miss Crocker made her appearance. She whispered a word to her friend who laughed, removed her feet, and together they whirled away, while the porch ornaments held a conclave and decided that without the powerful backing of her money the Boston heiress would be frowned on in society.

The New Aristocracy

Count Geoffrey d'Abbans has been bereft of his title by order of the French government, but he is by no means alone in his affliction, and hereafter counts, vicomptes and dukes with French patronymics will be less conspicuous in the annals of society both at home and abroad. Some time ago an order was issued calling upon all titled persons of the republic to produce proofs of their legitimacy by the first of June. Many made no reply whatever to the summons, and many more affected to treat the matter with indifference, saying that they did not value the title sufficiently to go to the trouble necessary to vindicate their ownership. It has been almost the universal custom of ambassadors and diplomatic representatives to assume some title with the idea of adding to their social rank and importance, and out of a total of forty-eight of those bearing titles it has been found that only seven could show a legal right to them. The titled French nobility today outnumber manyfold the "aristocrats" which the Revolution attempted to exterminate, and it has been asserted, apparently upon good grounds, that the present wearers of distinction are very often not even remotely connected by blood with the old families from whom they claim descent. Many of the emigres refused to return to France after the terror had subsided, having no means upon which to subsist, much less to restore their ruined chateaux to habitable shape. Many others died abroad and with them their line was extinguished. Servants or ambitious bourgeoise, knowing the facts, or confident that their claims would never be disputed, set themselves up in the seats of the mighty and the French aristocracy of today is, in large part, representative of the same class, if not the same individuals who were most active in promoting liberty and equality a century ago.

Entering the Service

Since Fort Baker was established most of the pretty young girls in and about San Francisco have joined the service indirectly. Last week another army engagement was announced, and it is said there are several more almost ready for publicity. At a tea given by Miss Marjorie Brown the guests were entrusted with the secret of her engagement to Lieutenant John G. Holtz, U. S. A., now at Fort Baker. Miss Brown is a cousin of Mrs. Horton Phipps, and has lived for quite a while in Sausalito, where a coterie of the young and pretty belles were captured by popular officers. There were Anne Sperry, who became the wife of Lieutenant Clarence Carrigan;

Philanthropists Wed

An engagement, the rumor of which was whispered some time ago, was confirmed on Thursday, June 3, by a very quiet wedding which came as a decided surprise to all but the immediate families. Miss Ellen Chabot, one of the most prominent members of the Lakeside set of Oakland, became the bride of Henry Bothin, President of the Judson Iron Works, the ceremony taking place at Miss Chabot's home on Second avenue and East Fifteenth street, Oakland, Rev. Royal L. Wirt, assistant pastor of the First Congregational Church officiating. The utmost simplicity, and one might almost say secrecy, marked the affair, for the license was applied for only two hours before the wedding, and only a few very intimate friends were present, among them ex-Secrtary Victor H. Metcalf and Mrs. Metcalf, Mrs. C. O. G. Miller, Miss Bessie McNear and Mrs. Henry Miller. Neither bride nor groom had the customary attendants. Miss Chabot is the daughter of the late Anthony Chabot, one of the pioneers of Oakland, the founder of the Contra Costa Water Company and the donor of the Chabot Observatory. She has always been interested in charity, as has Mr. Bothin likewise. When his former wife, who was Miss Jennie Whittier, daughter of William F. Whittier, the "paint man," made her application for divorce, she based her complaint largely on Mr. Bothin's propensity to dissipate his fortune in charity and philanthropy. The Bothins journeyed to the Vendome on their honeymoon.

Married in Her Father's Old Church

The attractive little burg of Sausalito was the scene of a genuine "English" country wedding last week, when Miss Frances Reed plighted her troth to Henry Milner Rideout in the quaint little church on the hill, to which there was a sentimental attachment, since it was the same church of which the bride's father, the late Rev. Frederick Reed was pastor, and where, twenty-five years ago the wedding of the bride's parents was celebrated. The ceremoney took place at ten o'clock in the morning, the service being read by Rev. Edward Maxwell. It was followed by a reception at the home of the bride's mother, Mrs. Henry C. Campbell. Only relatives and intimate friends were present. The bride, a tall, stately blonde who resembles her father, presented a pretty picture in her wedding gown, with long white tulle veil and shower bouquet of lilies of the valley. Her only attendant was Miss Marion Wright, the fiancee of Henry C. Campbell, who wore white mull over pink silk, and carried a bouquet of delicate pink blossoms. Charles Rideout, a cousin of the groom, was his best man. After a short honeymoon the Rideouts will leave for Boston but will return to California in the fall.

The Embarrassments of a Bridal Couple

The aftermath of the Bender-Young wedding was a serious of episodes not calculated for by the wildest of the practical jokers. When the bride and groom left the house and managed to escape one conspicuously decorated auto they found themselves obliged to take their second car just as lavishly adorned. Before this had proceeded far it broke down, and defying the doctoring of its attendant, had to be abandoned. Then followed a disconsolate wait at the street corner, surrounded by tell-tale baggage, when a dilapidated auto with a forlorn chauffeur came in sight. Him they hailed, and after a hastily-made bargain, arrived at the depot just in time for a train to San Jose. Their gratitude for safety was short lived, however, for they found themselves surprised by a crowd of their wedding guests who had taken the same train for San Mateo, but they made the best of the situation and invited their unexpected ones into their car and enjoyed themselves as best they could until San Mateo came to their rescue. Arrived at the Vendome in San Jose the first sight that greeted Mrs. Young was another friend, likewise a wedding guest. "This is a tragedy!" she exclaimed. "Please—please, keep our advent a secret," and she fled to her rooms followed by a peal of laughter.

announcement, the engagements of her two young daughters who have but just emerged from the schoolroom, the elder sister, Miss Gladys, to Harry Norman Child of Spokane, Washington, and the younger, Miss Constance, to Ensign George Joerns of the U. S. S. Colorado. The romance of Miss Gladys had its beginning when Mr. Child was attending the University of California and Miss Cummings was a frequent visitor in Berkeley, where she was a favorite with the younger set. Mr. Child, Sr., is a banker, and his son is engaged in the same institution. Miss Constance Cummings and her fiance met at one of the Fairmont balls given during "fleet week," and with them it was a case of love at first sight. Ensign Joerns is from Duluth, Minnesota. The Cummings girls were educated at the Dominican convent in San Rafael, and attended the private finishing school conducted by Miss Hamlin in this city. They are exact opposites of each other in personal appearance, Miss Gladys being a tall, stately brunette, while Miss Constance is a petite blonde. No date has yet been set for the weddings. Earl Cummings, the sculptor, who designed the gateway to the University campus which will soon be constructed at the Telegraph avenue entrance, is a brother, and Tom Clausen, the noted painter, a cousin.

The Passing of Dr. Gunn

The death of Dr. Neil Donald Gunn at Pacific Grove last Saturday night, as the result of a gasoline explosion in one of the drug stores, cast the whole peninsula of Monterey into mourning. Besides his well-deserved reputation as a physician and surgeon, Dr. Gunn had made his way into the hearts of the people through his sympathetic and kindly nature. He was a man of broad outlook and deep culture. During his fifteen years of practice in Montreal, where, for much of the time he held the chair of professor of biology and histology, he spent his summers abroad, and there were few spots on the European continent with which he was unfamiliar. Had he lived he would have spent the present summer and fall in Paris with Mrs. Gunn, still further pursuing his medical studies.

Athletics at Del Monte

A golf tournament which will eclipse any other ever held on the Pacific Coast is arranged to take place on the Del Monte links this fall, beginning Friday, August 27th and continuing until Monday, September 6th. In view of the large entry list, which is expected to include about one hundred and twenty men and thirty women, a new scheme has been adopted. All the men will play qualifying rounds over thirty-six holes from scratch. The sixteen players who return the best scores will qualify for the first match round and will play without handicap for the Del Monte Championship, the winner and runner-up receiving prizes. It is also suggested that the winner of the defeated eight receive a prize. The second sixteen in the qualifying round will enter the first match round in competition for the Del Monte Cup, which will be played with handicap. The Del Monte Championship Trophy will probably be a challenge one to be won three times by the same player before it becomes his property. The ladies will play for the Del Monte Cup for Women under the usual conditions, except that the best sixteen scores will qualify for the first match round. There will be consolation handicaps open to all who fail to reach the finals in any round. As golf enthusiasts from all parts of the State will be present, an opportunity will be made for reviving an event which excited much interest in the ante-conflagration days but which has not been heard of since—a match between Northern and Southern California. Mixed foresomes will also be played. Dr. Sumner Hardy President of the Pacific States Lawn Tennis Association, reports that the directors of that organization have decided to hold the annual championship tournament at Del Monte from September 6th to 15th. An effort will be made to attract not only the cracks of Northern and Southern California but the skilled players of the coast from British Columbia to Old Mexico. That the City of Mexico Country Club numbers some strong players amongst its members is evidenced by the fact that in the tournament held there in March Miss Patricia Butler and her brother defeated Miss Florence Sutton and Nat Browne in mixed doubles.

Discharged Prisoners' Home

The new Home for Discharged Prisoners at 110 Silver street has been completed by the California Prison Commission, and adequately furnished through the efforts of the Woman's Auxiliary to the Board. The building was thrown open to the public on Wednesday afternoon, when a reception was held by the Woman's Auxiliary. Thursday and Friday were also visitors' days, and on all three occasions addresses were given by State officers and other interested in the welfare of the unfortunates. The Prison Commission was organized in November, 1865, by Governor Low, its first president. Rev. James Woodworth, its first secretary, continued to serve in that capacity for thirty-nine years, until his death. The present officers are Charles Montgomery, president; Rev. H. H. Bell, D. D., vice-president; Rev. John Hemphill, D. D., secretary; A. J. Ralston, treasurer. Mrs. I. Lowenberg is president of the Auxiliary, and associated with her as officers and directors are all the women prominent in philanthropic and charitable movements in San Francisco and its vicinity. The home will be a place where the discharged convict may have every opportunity to rehabilitate himself mentally and morally and to seek and gain self-respect to the point of demanding the respect of others. The commission will aid men in gaining employment and will furnish bonds when necessary for the honesty of those recommended for positions of trust, and what is probably of more practical value than all the rest, will protect them from blackmail and see that no harm comes to the man who is trying to do right.

The Girls' Settlement Club

Miss Ruth Powers, the daughter of Dr. and Mrs. George Powers, recently returned from a lengthy stay abroad where she has been cultivating her voice. She sang last week at the Girls' Settlement Club, and her friends and others present are predicting a brilliant future for her. The Girls' Settlement Club, which is presided over by Misses Rachel and Eva Wolfsohn, is becoming as much of a fad here as it is in New York, where prominent society women devote a day or an evening a week to the worthy cause. Some of the women prominent in all the local philanthropic movements are giving both time and money to the furtherance of settlement work. The Board of Managers includes Mrs. Jessie W. Lilienthal, Mrs. Leon Sloss, Mrs. Charles J. Durbrow, Miss Aimee Steinhart, Mrs. Paolo de Vecchi, Mrs. Eugene Gallois, Mrs. I. W. Hellman, Mrs. Abraham Stern and Miss Brooks.

In the Social Spotlight

Society people in San Jose have adopted the San Francisco practice of entertaining their friends at a hotel in preference to their home, for San Jose has discovered that the Vendome's chef is an artist. Among the luncheons given at the Vendome last week was one at which Mrs. Simpson, wife of Dr. William E. Simpson, entertained twenty-four friends. The table decorations were most beautiful. After luncheon Mrs. Simpson entertained at a card party.

State Superintendent of Schools, Edward Hyatt, with Mrs. Hyatt, have been in the vicinity of Pacific Grove, in company with County Superintendent Duncan Sterling, visiting the public schools.

Grant Wallace and his bride are settled on the shore of Monterey bay, where Mr. Wallace is experimenting with scientific tree culture.

Mrs. Phoebe Hearst has been a guest at the Fairmont for several days. She comes down frequently from her home, "The Hacienda," at Pleasanton.

The home of Mrs. Van Renssaler Patterson will be the scene of a pretty wedding on June 16, when Miss Marjorie Patterson will become the bride of Ira Roover. The affair will be very simple, only relatives and intimate friends being invited. Miss Patterson is the youngest daughter of the late Judge Van R. Patterson. Her mother was one of the interesting Kelcey sisters of Stockton's exclusive set. Since the death of Judge Patterson the family have resided in Berkeley, where Mrs. Illig, who was Miss Kelcey Patterson, also resides now, having recently returned from the cast to Cloyne Court.

Mr. and Mrs. William Kent and their family, with Mrs. A. Kent, left this week for their Lake Tahoe home.

Mrs. John A. Bauer, who is visiting Mrs. George Marcus in Mill Valley, will soon take up her residence with her daughter, Mrs. Charles J. Forster, for the summer.

Mrs. Charles Wood, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. O. B. Gunn, will soon build a handsome residence in Menlo Park which which she will make her permanent home.

Mr. and Mrs. G. Plummer, Mrs. Laura Rowe and Miss Emily Johnson are at Yosemite.

Mrs. Carrie Green Noble, with her mother, Mrs. Duff Green, and her sister, Miss Florine Green, has taken a house at Jackson and Jones streets.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Davis of Ross Valley, accompanied by Mrs. Spencer, will leave soon for Pacific Grove, where they have taken a cottage for the summer.

Miss Fannie Daniels, who has been living in Berkeley since the fire, has returned to the city and taken a house at Filbert and Hyde streets. Mr. Samuel Daniels has entirely recovered from his late severe illness.

Mrs. Charles Christenson of San Rafael was hostess at a bridge party during the week. Mrs. Christenson and her daughter Marion will leave for Seattle about the fifteenth of this month.

Mrs. R. N. Graves, with her two young grandsons, left on Friday for Edgehill, St. Helena, where they will remain until September.

Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Van Bergen, with their pretty daughter, Miss Mina, and their young son, Nicholas, leave the city this week to pass the summer at Hacienda, the country home of the Charles J. Forsters. Mrs. Forster and Mrs. Van Bergen were the interesting Bauer sisters.

Mrs. Eugene Lent has taken a house in San Mateo for the summer.

Mrs. Marmaduke Kellogg and her daughter Louise will pass the summer abroad.

Miss Kate Hall was hostess at an informal card party during the week in honor of Mrs. Claude Block, the wife of Lieutenant Block, U. S. N., who leaves shortly to join her husband now stationed in Virginia. Mrs. Block was the attractive Augusta Kent.

Milo M. Potter, the popular proprietor of the Hotel Potter of Santa Barbara and the Van Nuys of Los Angeles, is a visitor at the Fairmont where he is awaiting the return of Mrs. Potter and her daughter, who are due to arrive on Tuesday by the China, after an extended visit to Honolulu.

Mr. and Mrs. Russell G. Colt of New York are registered at the Fairmont. Mrs. Colt will be better recognized at Ethel Barrymore, who is at the Van Ness for a week, playing in one of the lighter comedies so popular at present. She is always sure of an enthusiastic reception in San Francisco.

Sausalito was unusually gay on Tuesday, the 8th, for, in the morning there was the Reed-Rideout wedding, and then an elaborate luncheon given by Mrs. Shoobert in honor of Mrs. Frank Findley. Later in the same day Mrs. Findley was the guest of honor at a tea given by Mr. and Mrs. Edgell. Mr. Findley is now engaged in the wool business in Boston, and Mrs. Findley (Rose Miller), will leave shortly to join him there, and it is possible that they will make Boston their permanent home.

Charles Alden Cooke, for many years in charge of the Raymond and Whitcomb interests on this coast, has been appointed manager of the Fairmont Hotel, taking the place which has been so ably filled by Mr. Obadiah Rich. Mr. Rich will go to the Palace as assistant manager under General Manager John C. Kirkpatrick, Mr. Cooke filling the same office at the Fairmont. He is one of the best known and most popular men in the country, especially with the traveling public, and his connection with the Palace Hotel Company will be an admirable one. He will enter upon his duties on the first of July, and in the meantime, with Mrs. and Miss Cooke, he will make an extended trip through the northwest and probably Alaska.

Amongst recent arrivals from Honolulu registered at the Fairmont are Mr. F. M. Hatch, Miss Hatch and Gilbert Hatch, Mr. and Mrs. G. P. Castle, Miss Dorothy and Miss Margaret Castle. Both families are frequent visitors from the islands to this city.

More Maugham Comedy

"Lady Frederick," W. Somerest Maugham's comedy of fashionable life, was presented to a large and dressy audience at the Van Ness on Monday evening last. In the title role Ethel Barrymore has a part that fits her line one of her own gowns, that is to say, to perfection. Nothing could be more unstagy than her acting. She has the cool assured manner of the woman of the world, and talks off her witty lines with all the nonchalance of the drawing room. The plot is simple. Lady Frederick Berolles is a disillusioned widow with a past not by any means so bad as she allows people to think. She is in debt and needs money. At the opening of the play she has captivated young Lord Mereston who has an income of £50,000 a year; also a mother, Lady Mereston, who is resolved that he shall not throw himself away on the widow, and an uncle, Mr. Paradine Fouldes, who loved Lady Frederick before her marriage. In her eagerness to break off her son's attachment to the fascinating widow Lady Mereston has no scruples as to the means she uses, while on the contrary, Lady Frederick has a strain of generosity in her which at the critical moment impels her to burn the letters which would ruin the other woman's happiness and belief in the father of her son. There is really only one tense and dramatic moment in the play, and that is when Lady Frederick, holding the tell-tale bundle of letters in her hand, hounded, and tempted to use them, hesitates, relents, and throws them into the fire. A vein of true metal in her comes to the surface. She cannot take a despicable advantage of her foe. The same feeling combined with a little streak of humor prompts her to invite the infatuated young Mereston, now more in love than ever, to call the next morning at ten for his answer. Here in the most whimsical but natural manner, she allows him to see the mysteries of her toilet, and thus effects the disillusionment of the youth. Miss Barrymore plays this scene with a sure and light touch, and with the most charming coquetry, even while she knows the consequence is to be fatal to her prospects as the future Lady Mereston. Another good scene is that with her dressmaker to whom she owes seven hundred pounds. Madame Claude comes with fire in her eye and determination in her heart not to leave without her money, she goes away flattered and mollified, and refuses a checque when it is offered to her. The play abounds in witty lines, and has an underlying current of cynicism and worldly cleverness, without however being unclean or unhealthy. In it Miss Barrymore has an excellent opportunity for her line of acting, which is certainly high comedy. Ethel Barrymore does not seek for broad effects nor high colors—hers is rather the art of the dry point etcher. Her effects are obtained by a glance, an inflection, an aside. Her supporting company is excellent, Mr. Bruce McRae as Mr. Paradine Foulds shares honors with the star; Miss Jessie Millward as Lady Mereston was effective; Orlando Daly as the money lender Captain Montgomerie was the nearest thing to a villain in the cast. No society play would be a success without a pair of young lovers as a foil to the worldly wise ones; Charles Hammond as Sir Gerald O'Mara and Vera Stowe as Rose, daughter of Admiral Carlisle were all that their parts called for. "Lady Frederick" is a play with more body than "Jack Straw," and the leading role is neatly fitted to the Drew personality of Ethel Barrymore. This fact and its witty lines quite account for the success it has enjoyed.

—M. I. Connell.

"The Blue Mouse"

What promises to be the one real theatrical event of the season is the engagement of "The Blue Mouse" at the American Theatre, which begins tomorrow (Sunday), June 13th. It has been pretty well advertised that the Messrs. Shubert, who are at the head of the Independent Theatrical Managers, will, until a new theatre is built for them, play all their many and varied attractions at this theatre: "The Blue Mouse," heralded as the newest and best work of that popular playwright, Mr. Clyde Fitch, will be the first offering of the Messrs. Shubert. "The Blue Mouse" is coming with a strong endorsement of the Eastern press, and it is the first "gun," so to speak, from the Independent Managers. It is an adaptation from the German. It has been running for more than a year in Germany and in France. It has been presented in Austria and Sweden, and it is now in its ninth month of wonderful success at Shubert's Lyric Theatre, New York, and from present indications will continue in that city for another year. In adapting "The Blue Mouse," Mr. Fitch had for his motto "Make 'em laugh" and from all reports he has succeeded beyond all expectations. He has also been extremely fortunate in originating several novel scenes as well as inventing characters that are said to be entirely new to the stage. The character of Paulette Divine, "The Blue Mouse," is a new type of chorus girl. She speaks slang and is ready to flirt with every man who comes her way. She is made up half of sentimentality, half of shrewdness. This part is played by Miss Elsa Ryan, one of the most winsome little actresses of the day.

MISS ELSA RYAN

In "The Blue Mouse" at the American Theatre next week.

Florence Roberts in "Du Barry"

In the Alcazar's presentation of David Belasco's historical drama, "Du Barry," commencing next Monday evening, Florence Roberts will be supported by Thurlow Bergen and the Alcazar players. This unquestionably is the most pretentious venture yet undertaken by the Alcazar management. Miss Roberts is receiving a weekly salary that runs into four figures, and about $6,000 has been spent to equip the play with inanimate accessories. The cast embraces fifty-two speaking characters and double that number of supernumeraries, and the five acts introduce nine complete changes of scene, each of the stage pictures being both elaborate and artistic. "Du Barry" was written by Mr. Belasco to serve as a starring vehicle for Mrs. Leslie Carter, and for a number of years it was generally conceded to be the most stupendous production on the American stage. It tells the true story of how Jeanette, the beautiful daughter of a French clerk of customs, was apprenticed to a Parisian milliner, became the catspaw of Count Du Barry, roue and gamester, and so infatuated King Louis XV that he made her his favorite and by marrying her to the count's brother qualified her to be presented at court as the Countess Du Barry. Her rule over the King was so absolute that statesmen, courtiers and ministers of state were favored or disgraced in accordance with her desire, and in matters of deportment she was equally arbitrary, her most absurd whims being adopted as en regle by the ladies in waiting. When the King died she was pensioned and relegated to a suburban mansion which he had presented to her, and there she dwelt and plotted until the Revolution broke out and the Tribunal convicted her of having dissipated treasures of the state, and she was publicly beheaded. David Belasco took infinite pains and spent an enormous sum of money to make his play a replica of the most luxurious court in French history, and his stage directions have been rigidly adhered to in preparing the Alcazar production. Among the stage pictures are the milliner's shop in Paris, Du Barry's apartments, the Palace of Versailles, the royal gardens, the woods of Louvecinnes, and a street in front of the millinery, where Du Barry is seen going to execution. Miss Roberts will be seen in the title part, Mr. Bergen as Cosse-Brissac, of the King's Guards, E. L. Bennison as the King, Howard Hickman as Count Du Barry, Burt Wesner as Duc de Brissac, Norval McGregor as the Papal Nuncio, Ernest Glendinning as the porter at the millinery, Walter Belasco as Du Barry's father, Adele Belgarde as the head milliner, Bessie Barriscale as one of her employees, Christie MacLean as the keeper of a gaming house and Louise Brownell as an opera singer.

New York Life in "Salvation Nell"

Next week Mrs. Fiske will be seen at the Valencia in her mammoth production of "Salvation Nell," remarkable for its realistic scene of New York life as well as for the realism and dramatic intensity of the play itself. The wonderful tenement street scene, with its four story houses on all sides, its fire escapes, hurdy gurdies, fruit stands, saloon, pawn shops, is the largest scene ever staged. Twenty-six men are required to set this scene, and immediately on the arrival of the "Mrs. Fiske Special Train" Sunday, the stage mechanics will rush to their task. The spectator views in this scene the actual home life of dozens of tenement dwellers; lights come and go in the windows, people are seen busy at their household tasks, or else they come forth on to the fire escapes for a breath of evening air. In fact the actual life in one of the crowded centers of New York is realized.

"The Morals of Marcus"

Ethel Barrymore's engagement at the Van Ness Theatre in the comedy entitled "Lady Frederick" is a success and everybody seems to feel that the second of the Maugham works to be seen in San Francisco is the more pleasing of the two notwithstanding the fact that "Jack Straw" as presented by John Drew was a complete triumph. "Lady Frederick" is, thoroughly entertaining, has novel situations, bright dialogue and brilliant epigrams. The next attraction at the Van Ness Theatre will be another Charles Frohman star, charming Marie Doro whose hit a couple of seasons back in William Gillette's production of "Clarice" brought her into the stellar ranks. During her coming engagement at the Van Ness Theatre Miss Doro will be seen in the four act play by William J. Locke called "The Morals of Marcus." It was adapted for the stage by the author of the novel "The Morals of Sir Marcus Ordeyne," and the result is said to be admirable. A great supporting company will appear with Miss Doro. Prominent among the names in the cast are Edwin Arden and Marie Wainwright. The advance sale of seats begins next Thursday.

Orpheum Vaudeville

The Orpheum has seldom presented a program pregnant with greater promise than that announced for next week. Adelaide, the dainty American danseuse, popularly known as La Petite Adelaide and one of the most accomplished toe dancers in this country will present a terpsidiorean act entitled "The Bill Poster's Dream" in which she will have the assistance of four handsome and clever coryphees. Miss Elizabeth M. Murray will reappear after too long an absence and delight with her Irish and Coon ditties which she renders in a manner that is simply inimitable. Mildred Warren, Bert Lyon and Louise Meyers, a clever triol of musical comedy artists, will introduce a one act comedy sketch with music entitled "When Dreams Come True." The Sisters Gasch wonderful female gymnasts who created quite a furore in New York and who are renowned all over Europe are reasonably expected to prove a great sensation for no performers of their sex have ever equalled them in acrobatic skill and daring. Next week will be the last of Cheridah Simpson, Novelty Dancing Four, Albert L. Pellaton and William Foran in "A Spotless Reputation" and the Ellis-Nowlan Company in "A Night at the Circus." A novel series of extraordinarily interesting motion pictures will conclude the performance.

Grand Opera at the Princess

The W. A. Edwards International Grand Opera Company which scored a tremendous success in New York and other cities of the east, will begin its first season in this city at the Princess Theatre next Monday night. The organization is a most perfect one and includes, in addition to the three distinct casts of principals, a complete chorus, ballet and orchestra. It also brings with it beautiful and elaborate scenery and costumes for each opera. The repertoire for next week is as follows: Monday and Saturdays evenings, "Aida," with Therry, Strauss, Zarad, Colombini, Arcangeli, Gravina, Oteri and Giuliano in the cast; Tuesday and Friday evenings and Wednesday matinee, "La Traviata," with Bertossi, Zarad, Donner, Amadi, De Giaccomo, Oteri, Kaplan and Giuliano; Wednesday evening and Saturday matinee, "Fedora," with Therry, Donner, Williams, Colombini, Arcangeli, Giuliano, De Giaccomo, Gravina, Oteri and Correnti; Thursday and Sunday evenings, (double bill), with Duce-Merola, Strauss, Kaplan, Colombini and Zara in "Cavalleria Rusticana," and Bertossi, Amadi, Arcangeli and Giuliano in "I'Pagliacci." The Conductor will be Signor G. Merola, one of the most famous of European musicians.

New Company for Ye Liberty

With the performances of "Old Heidelberg" at Ye Liberty Playhouse this Sunday and evening, the stock company that has been appearing at that Oakland theatre for the past three years will conclude its season. For the week commencing next Monday evening Mr. James Keane, an actor well known to playgoers on both sides of the bay, will present "Fabio Romani," his own dramatization of Marie Corelli's widely read novel, "The Vendetta," and at the conclusion of its run of one week the re-organized Bishop Players will present for the first time in Oakland David Belasco's celebrated success, "The Girl of the Golden West." So widely known is this play that there is really nothing new to be said of it, and the interest therefore is centered more in the new company that is to appear in the piece. And the Ye Liberty management declare that it will be the strongest and most evenly balanced company that has ever appeared at the theatre. The leading people are Florence Oakley and Sydney Ayres, both of whom will be entirely new to Oakland playgoers. Miss Oakley until a few weeks ago was leading lady at the Valencia Theatre, and previous to that appeared in the same capacity with the Auditorium and Belasco Theatre stock companies in Los Angeles. She is a very young girl, exceedingly pretty and an excellent actress. Sydney Ayres has also had a great deal of experience, and like Miss Oakley, is unusually young and possessed of his share of good looks. The members retained from the old company are Lillian Elliott, George Friend, George Webster and Henry Shumer, and the others are now being assembled and will be announced next week. The advent of this new company is the most important event of the Oakland theatrical calendar and is being awaited with great interest by across the bay theatregoers.

In the Limelight

The Viennese music publisher, Bernhardt Herzmansky, is said to have made over $750,000 profit out of the publication of the musical score of "The Merry Widow." He secured the concession for very little from the composer, who never expected to see the public scrambling for his music. He almost looked upon the publisher as a brave man.

One of the early attractions at the Van Ness Theatre will be Frederick Thompson's elaborate production of the comedy drama called "Polly of the Circus."

Hundred upon hundreds of orders are coming in by phone, telegraph, and letter asking for reservations for "The Merry Widow" seats. The advance sale opens Thursday, July 1st.

Blanche Bates will play an engagement this season at the Van Ness.

of life, witnessed only by the moon shining in over the crazy wooden balcony before the window—the good old moon, which has seen so many queer things on this earth.

Schachtschabel sprang up and trotted about noiselessly in his felt slippers like a queer little grey animal in its cage. He tossed the things about in the drawers of his old-fashioned desk until he found a heap of lined paper. Then he sat down again and wrote and wrote—hasty, careless scratchings that had nothing in common with his correct copyist's hand—and poured out all that his soul had absorbed from the works he had copied.

When then his dithyrambic intoxication had thrown him exhausted on his bed, in the chill of early morning, he would wake again, after a short sleep, to complete his forgotten copying. With aching head and dulled senses, he would suddenly discover, in pained surprise, so much that reminded him of his own composition. He pulled out his manuscript—there it was! And a slow distrust and suspicion of all composers crept into his soul. They had robbed him, had stolen his most secret thoughts.

His manner became more and more mysterious, something prophetic crept into it. He would hint at revelations, great and terrible revelations which would cause an upheaval in the entire world of music and literature. And he found followers who believed in him. Old Schachtschabel was one of those for whom the gates of fame and success had remained closed. And all those who are misunderstood, oppressed, disappointed, felt themselves attracted to him. The little opera pupil who did not get any parts; the machinist insulted by the stage manager; the chorus singer whose request for an increase of salary had been refused—they all found hope and comfort in Schachtschabel's mysterious judgments. They took him seriously.

* * * * * * * *

The pompous roll of the bridal music announced that Elsa of Brabant was about to appear in all her glory of wedding garments, to enter the cathedral. Schachtschabel grew uneasy. He threw his cloak back over his shoulder and struck an attitude of warlike pride. His thin little face glowed with excitement.

It was always the same excitement. At this point in the opera his heart would beat with mad impetuousness, as if it was his happiness that was about to pass him slowly—a happiness he could never halt nor hold for his own. The flutes and violins sang in wild rejoicing, the rush and roar of the horns filled the air with a whirl of sound, as he stood breathless. Elsa's young beauty shone out supreme amid the gleam of jewels, the shimmer of satin and waving veil, the glory of golden locks, as she came out from her chamber. Solemnly she came down the steps, before her a group of children with lighted torches, and the soul of the little chorus singer bowed before her in fiery devotion. He worshiped this Elsa, as he had worshiped the silver-haired old lady down there in a front row seat, forty years before. Schachtschabel had loved every Elsa that had been engaged during his time at the Court Theatre. He himself had grown old and withered, but his love had remained untouched in all these years. The hand of time had glided gently over this ever old and yet ever new passion, as gently as cloud-shadows over a flowered meadow. For him Elsa, his love, could not grow old. She was ever the same blooming blonde beauty, with her fair white throat and arms, with her glory of golden tresses, and her voice of radiant sweetness. And his heart went out to her now, as it had forty years before.

And yet—lately—Schachtschabel seemed to feel that the hope of his life was slipping from him, was slipping away behind a dull autumnal fog. He felt that he was old and feeble. He realized now that he would never stand there on those steps and sing "Elsa, I love thee—." And as if in farewell, his eyes rested sadly on the beautiful woman who walked slowly past him, the hem of her robe touching his feet.

The orchestra poured forth a glorious rush of sound; the silence in the audience proclaimed the hush of attention for the scene that was about to be performed before the altar steps—then suddenly the catastrophe came with horrible swiftness.

As Ortrud pushed her hated antagonist aside, Elsa stumbled over her enemy's gown, made a sudden change of position to right herself—her veil floated over the torches. The flames flared up, caught her hair, and she stood wrapped in fire. A great hundred-voiced cry filled the house. The wings caught fire, the knights and ladies rushed wildly from the stage. The audience, in mad panic, fought and scrambled its way to the exits.

One man alone of all the hundreds ran to where the burning woman stood, caught her in his arms, in spite of her struggles, and pressed her head close to his breast. A tongue of flame shot up in his face and a scream of pain came from his lips. But with his naked hands he tore off the burning veil and beat out the flames in her hair.

Then a stream of water from the fire hose drenched them

A sudden silence falls on the house. The stage is a mass of blackened, smoking chaos.

The curtain drops slowly. Some few in the audience return to their seats to find out what has happened. The singers surround Elsa, who is staggering from fright and exhaustion. The shock has been terrible, but she can find her voice—her wounds are slight—she is saved as by a miracle.

The little chorus singer lies unconscious at her feet. They lift him up—he moans in pain—a cry of horror arises from those about him. The scorched flesh falls in pieces from his hands, and his eye-sockets are open, glowing wounds.

They carry him to his humble home on the top floor of the old house. Physicians attend him. He is tenderly cared for.

Old Schachtschabel has at last become one of the great heroes, he is the center of attention of the entire city. The duke sends his own valet to attend the wounded man. The silver-haired prima donna sends to ask news of him—the first Elsa who had, all unconscious, awakened ambition in his soul. The Intendant himself comes to inquire and to assure him of his respect.

He lies in fever, in terrible agony. He cannot see or hear the sensation his first debut upon his dearly loved stage has made.

On the evening of the third day Elsa herself comes to his bedside. She is still pale and exhausted, the wounds in her neck are not yet healed. But the fresh young beauty of her face is untouched, her voice unharmed, her life and fame safe. She has come to thank the man who saved her. They told her that the time was short.

When the little chorus singer hears the rustle of her silken skirts—when he feels the gentleness of her soft hand on his forehead—life seems to come back to him once more. He tries to raise himself in his cushions, and turns his bandaged, sightless face to hers. His eyes, the sad, dimmed eyes that had waited so long for the moment of his heroism, for the great happiness, are blinded forever. Hoarse tones come painfully from his throat. Elsa bends over him, supports him in her arms and listens. Through the death-rattle in his breast, hoarse, stammering, old Schachtschabel tries to sing—"Elsa, I love thee." Then he falls back, trembles a moment, and dies.

[illegible] of the Diamond Rubber Company [illegible] to get the cut of Diamond Tires that is offered that Monday to anyone who [illegible] Diamond Tires used in the twenty-four hour endurance run, though several did considerable scouting, and their efforts only showed tires in perfect shape.

"An index to the volume of business which is being done by the Studebaker houses of the west may be had from an inspection of our books for the past week," says John H. Fagal of the automobile department of the Studebaker Bros. "The last seven days we sold twenty Studebaker E-M-F '30' cars, six Studebaker-Garford '30' cars, four Studebaker-Garford '40' cars and two electric automobiles. In round numbers this represents an expenditure of about $64,000 but the actual business done would total close to $10,000 more if I were figuring in the cost of extras which nearly every owner buys when he purchases a car."

E. P Brinegar, President of the Pioneer Automobile Company, has announced that Roy M. Pike had taken an interest in, and secretaryship of the big motor car concern and from now on would be actively connected with the general sales work of the house. Mr. Pike is one of the most widely known young men of this city, and his determination to enter the autoinobile trade has caused much comment on the row. Pike will take hold of his new work with the experience which comes from handling large business enterprises. His latest connection was the organization of the Golden West Saddlery Company which absorbed the bankrupt stock of the Main, Winchester and Stone Company, and then sold out to R. P. Grubb Co. Beginning his business career while still in his teens, Pike was interested in the control of the telephone and steamship lines of the Upper Yukon. Returning from the far north he became western selling agent from 1900 to 1903 for several of the biggest steel, pipe, and tin plate firms of the country. Acting against the advice of fianciers who believed that the trust could not be successfully backed, he was one of the organizers of the United Can Company in 1903. This concern was a success from its inception. W. P. Fuller was associated with Mr. Pike in this concern, and they later sold out to a company that has successfully carried the business since. In 1905 in conjunction with John Rush Baird he organized the Federal Can Company and on the death of the latter he associated himself with John H. Spring of the Western National Bank and W. J. Hotchkiss of the Central California Canneries Company, and Hobbs, Wall and Company. Though badly hurt in the big fire this concern was reorganized and later in 1906 was merged with United Can Company at a profit to the stockholders.

Roads throughout Butte County are in splendid shape, according to James R. Legget of Oroville, who has been doing considerable touring in his home county recently in his Studebaker. "The road from Oroville to Chico is particularly good," says Legget. "The road from Oroville to Marysville is better than it ever has been and Yuba County is also taking better care of her roads this year than formerly."

When the flag to flag pathfinders who are blazing the way for the contest which takes place in October from Denver to the City of Mexico, in a thirty horsepower Chalmers-Detroit car, reach the Mexican capital they will be given an enthusiastic reception. The arrangements are being made by J. H. Mohler, a business partner of H. De Cress, the scout who took Knippers when the party left El Paso. Mohler and De Cress are two enterprising Americans, the agents in Mexico for Diamond tires, which equipment the pathfinders are using. President Diaz will receive the visitors at the palace and in the evening the American contingent of the Automobile Club of Mexico will have charge of a banquet to which automobilists of several nationalities will be invited.

Mr. and Mrs. L. I. Cowgill and son were registered yesterday at the Hotel Vendome in San Jose. They were on their return from a three week's trip touring in Southern California in their Oldsmobile. "The trip was a most delightful one," said Mr. Cowgill, "and the roads with but very few exceptions were in good condition and this is the best season of the year for California touring. I do not see why other motorists do not take more long trips. The car behaved perfectly. We did not take a chauffeur with us, by my son drove all the way."

That there were pieces of rubber in the carburators of some of the motor cars which failed to make perfect scores in the recent 24-hour endurance run over the San Leandro triangle and that the presence of these foreign substances in carburators of the Studebaker entries were responsible for the failure of these cars to capture two of the prize cups, has been positively established by the Standard Oil Company which furnished the gasoline used by the machines on that day. The following is an extract from a letter received by the Studebaker Bros. from the Standard Oil Company. "We find that the gasoline was supplied from a Standard Oil Company tank wagon into a Bowser tank, being put there in buckets, not through a hose. The gasoline was then pumped fom the Bowser tank through a steam hose into the machines. We learned that this steam hose became clogged with something, so much so that it was impossible to get a good stream of gasoline from the Bowser tank into the machines. This clogging was caused by rubber in the hose being loosened up by the gasoline. Portions of the rubber so loosened up passed with the gasoline into the tanks of the machines. We have in our possession both the steam hose that was originally on the Bowser tank and which undoubtedly caused the trouble as the rubber was worn or sloughed off on the inside, and the garden hose that was put on afterwards." The Standard people have in their possession both pieces of hose and are holding them subject to the inspection of anyone who wishes to see them.

STUDEBAKER WINS!

the approval and endorsement of thousands of owners in all parts of the country. Its fame is founded upon its wonderful endurance under all conditions and absolute reliability whether speeding gracefully over expensively maintained boulevards or negotiating almost impassable roads. The car's gain in popularity during the past year has been phenomenal. There's a reason for this. "STUDEBAKER STAMINA" is a pretty good explanation. Start right. Get a STUDEBAKER now. MURINE EYE REMEDY CO., Chicago, Ill.
Gentlemen:—We have a little fellow four months old who was troubled for three months after birth with sore eyes. A large amount of pus came from them, accompanied with severe inflammation. Our family Doctor, also an Eye Specialist, attended him without relief.
I saw your MURINE EYE REMEDY advertised in one of our Electric Cars, and utterly discouraged, I resolved to try it, and do you know, in three days' time all worry was over. In one week the Sore Eyes were a thing of the past.
This is an unasked for testimonial, but I know you will accept it as it is sent with much gratitude toward MURINE EYE REMEDY. Yours truly,
Arthur Snow.

THE GREAT INVESTMENT

Do you want timber lands?

Do you want to start a townsite?

Are you interested in agricultural or fruit lands?

If so, buy United States Government Land Certificates. They will purchase any timber or agricultural lands subject to entry in any State in the Union or Alaska. Title attaches at once. Residence on land unnecessary. You can start a townsite, select the finest timber lands, or locate the choicest farming land in any State from Florida to Alaska with this scrip. These certificates do not call for any certain tract of land but can be located on any lands subject to entry in the United States. You simply buy the land from the Government with this scrip. There is no time limit for locating same.

United States Government Land Certificates

These certificates come in 80 and 120-acre pieces and are approved by the Government. Each piece has a letter of approval attached to it from the Department of the Interior and they can be registered like a Government bond, so a duplicate can be issued by the Government in case original is destroyed by fire. Therefore they are as safe as a Government bond.

Approved by the Government

From an investment standpoint, where can you get anything that, by holding, greatly increases in value each year, where the Government of the United States is behind it and where you have something that is as safe as a Government bond? Or, if you wish to use it at any time you can take your choice of any Government agricultural lands in Florida, California, or any State or Territory of the United States, or where you can locate a townsite or select the finest timber lands that is open in the West or Northwest? Where could a man get a better investment for his money? Price $25.00 per acre.

These certificates have advanced 100 per cent in value in the past two years. Only a limited amount left in the United States.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 22419, Dept. No. 10.

HILDA M. WILSON, Plaintiff,
vs
FRANK J. WILSON, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to Frank J. Wilson, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion of plaintiff; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

WORSE THAN SPLIT INFINITIVES

(We are sometimes absurdly told—in the schoolroom—that we may not end a sentence with a preposition.)

I state a rule there is no doubt of,
To let a preposition end
A sentence is, my little friend,
A habit you must grow up out of.

It is the most distressing blunder
You can come near to. It would shock
The dullest, most unlettered stock
Australia can send up from under.

Such errors you should make a scoff of,
When on the sodden drenched grass plat,
Inform nurse with a smile that that
You really can't come in from off of.

This little lesson to be through with:
When to the country you are bid,
Inquire not whom, as once I did,
The country you'll be sent down to with!

A FRIEND OF BILL ADAMS

William Bowsprit, able-bodied seaman, had just returned from a voyage in a cocoanut ship, and was retailing his adventures to his pals.

"We were loading up with nuts at a little island," said he, "when our diver, who had gone down to get some winkles for tea, reported that the sea had washed away the under part o' the island, an' it was only held down by a few roots. Our skipper at once had it cut adrift; an' takin' the blessed island in tow, we started off with it, cokernut trees, monkeys, an' everything.

"The cap'n's idea was to bring the island home an' anchor it in th' Thames, or somewhere, an' exhibit it at a tanner a time, as a sample o' th' British dominions beyond th' seas, as you might say."

"Lor', lumme!" gasped one of the listening lubbers.

"We got as far as th' Bay o' Biscay all serene," went on the mariner, "when wot should we meet but the Baltic Fleet, an' thinkin' it was a disguised Japanese crooser we had in tow, I'm hanged if them drunken loonatics didn't blow our little cokernut island into smithereens with a torpedo! Rough luck, warn't it?"

SUSPICIOUS

"I will pay your debts today, but it is positively for the last time!"

"Oh, dear uncle, then wait at least until tomorrow!"

A COMPROMISE

"My bride wanted to go on a week's wedding tour, and I wanted to stay at home. Well, we compromised by going on a tour around the world!"

MORE WAYS THAN ONE

"Look at that couple over there. What red cheeks the woman has!"

"They're painted."

"But what a red nose he has."

"That's painted, too, but not in the same way."

A Captivating Sentiment

Mr. James Rolph in declining the nomination for mayor which was offered to him by the leading patriots of one of our industrious political factions gave utterance to the sentiment that "above most aims in life it is worth while to earn the approval of one's fellowmen." This is a beautiful sentiment, one that animates many distinguished citizens. It is the mainspring of much human action. It has inspired the conduct of statesmen, it has impelled soldiers to deeds of heroism, and it has affected the destinies of nations. There is nothing more commendable than to desire to earn the friendship and approval of one's fellowmen, but unfortunately in American politics men are oftentimes concerned with the winning rather than with the earning, in the sense of deserving, friendship and approval. The fact is that the passion for approval and friendship is one that is easily perverted, the reason being that it meets with a great deal of competition of an unscrupulous character. The man that desires the approval of his conscience as well as the approval of his fellowmen soon learns that he cannot have both, and unless he be a man of exceptionally strong character he will make the choice that is the least creditable to himself. Because of this almost inevitable consequence of a burning passion for public approval many learned men have preached the wholesomeness of contempt for the opinion of the general, and have disdained to enter into public affairs. If the people could always be depended upon to approve what is right and condemn what is wrong it would be plain sailing for the man with a passion for public esteem, but the people are easily misled, and the people by their perversity have tortured the minds and bodies of their noblest friends. Even our own Washington, to go no farther back in history, who was not lacking in appreciation of public esteem, lost for a time the confidence of the people of this country when he approved the treaty with Great Britain made by John Jay, and his heart was broken before he retired from office. In all ages public approval has been withheld from the deserving and bestowed on those who combined an appreciation of the emotional appeal and of psychological moments with an understanding of the value of platitudes and the importance of being all things to all men. From what we have heard of Mr. Rolph we are of the opinion that he is a good man, of excellent qualities of head and heart, and he would not astonish us if, notwithstanding his conception of the highest aim that man can have, he were to prove himself an efficient public servant, but we submit that San Francisco is badly in need of a mayor with greater zeal for the civic welfare than for popular approval.

A Warning From Hawaii

Our little brown brothers down in Hawaii are not as brotherly as some of us have been thinking. They have revolted against what they are pleased to regard as our tyranny; or perhaps it would be more accurate to say that they have taken a leaf out of our book and adopted some of our methods of adjusting conditions that do not comport with their ideas of the "square deal." There is a strike on among the Japanese laborers of the sugar plantations. They are dissatisfied with their wage of $18 a month and they have demanded a few dollars more, utterly ignoring the argument of their employers that in their own country they would not get half the money they are receiving in Hawaii. Unreasonable peasantry! Whatever may come of the trouble in our island territory, those who may be injured by this revolt of the Japanese helots will get little sympathy from the people of California. In the first place the profit of this cheap labor is of no benefit to the consumers of sugar in this country; the price of that commodity would be the same if the cost of the labor for its production were much less—as far as the sugar planters of Hawaii are concerned we don't care how much they are compelled to pay or how little. We are a selfish folk in this matter and we tell the sugar planters that they must look after their own interests, especially as they prefer the cheap contract labor of Japan to the labor of their own race and people. Then again we have consistently opposed Japanese immigration into the islands as we have opposed it on the mainland. Since the Hawaiian planters have encouraged this immigration, let them take the consequences of its importation. They have sowed the teeth of the dragon; let them reap whatever harvest may ensue. It is not likely that matters in Hawaii are as bad as they have been reported in the dispatches. If they did include a "wide-reaching conspiracy among the Japanese to take possession of the islands," the conspiracy was promptly "nipped in the bud." There will be no serious trouble of this kind until the Japanese government itself takes a hand. The time is not ripe for this action, however, and the "conspirators" will receive no encouragement from their Government. Of course that Government will not permit the Japanese lawbreakers to be dealt with as harshly as we would deal with our own rioters and "conspirators"; but aside from that sort of interference with the administration of our laws the Japanese will do nothing, except perhaps, to reformulate their hypocritical professions of undying friendship for the nation that compelled their shoguns to open their ports to the outside barbarian and thereafter taught them how to prevent that barbarian from monopolizing everything of value in the empire. No harm would result, viewed from the Californian or Pacific Coast standpoint, if the Japanese of Hawaii should continue to assert their self conceived right to dictate to the authorities and the industrial or commercial community. The spectacle of thousands of arrogant and domineering aliens seeking to control the affairs of white men would be an object lesson for some of our own diplomats, politicians, lawmakers and philanthropists. We have not yet recovered from the shock of that awful swat we received from the wielder of the big stick (may he live happy ever after in Africa!) and it would please us beyond measure if we could say to these wise people: "We were right and you were wrong; the Japanese are an undesirable element of our population, as we told you; and here is the proof. Now what are you going to do about it? But whatever you do be sure that you do not stultify your former policy and action in similar relation to California and the Pacific Coast."

Our Professional Good Men

"There is nothing worse than the professional good man." This sentiment evoked loud applause the other night at a gathering in New York of distinguished citizens of national celebrity. The speaker, Mr. Everett Colby of New Jersey, explained that he meant the pillar of the church "who places his reputation at the disposal of politicians." The explanation was unnecessary. We are all familiar with the type to which Mr. Colby alluded. The country is full of professional good men. They are among the most zealous of our civic patriots. They are the leaders of public thought, the perpetual regenerators of society, the uncompromising uplifters of the politically benighted. When they are not pillars of the church they are oracles of the temple. Indeed the most serviceable of our professional good men are ministers of the gospel. No well-regulated newspaper office is without a list of the expounders of religious truths who are available for the exigencies of yellow journalism, and whenever a "crusade" is on and public sentiment appears to be in need of a stimulus, reporters are sent out either for the right kind of interviews or to negotiate for sermons. Not the slightest difficulty is experienced in obtaining from the pulpit or the study sermons or interviews, words and sentiments in accordance with the wishes of the editor. Some preachers there are so avid for the limelight that they require no other inducement to talk or preach for publication than the offer of "space," but there are some thrifty workers in the vineyard of the Lord, we have been told authoritatively, who can be inspired for journalistic purposes by nothing short of a "donation." Fortunately for yellow journalism the preachers with a passion for the limelight are so numerous that the luxury of a donation sermon need seldom be indulged.

Why Verdicts Are Set Aside

In view of recent happenings in this State it must be obvious to intelligent observers that for the defects in the administration of justice upon which there has been much noisy animadversion the appellate courts are not responsible. So far, at least, as the criminal branch of the law is concerned it has become quite clear that our trial courts are not conducted as they should be. It is the popular impression, however, that whatever the imperfections that exist, they are confined to the courts to which appeals are taken. The supposition is that the judges of the appellate courts are forever building barriers out of the technicalities of the law to obstruct the course of justice. Now it is not hard to account for this widespread misapprehension which has been industriously propagated by muckrakers and the half-educated and unsuccessful representatives of the Bar. When men that are pretty generally believed to be guilty are tried and convicted the popular notion is that justice has been vindicated. The man in the street never stops to consider whether a person who has been convicted has received a fair trial. Nor has the average man any conception of the importance of according a person charged with crime the rights that are guaranteed him by the Constitution. It does not occur to him that the law is largely a matter of precedent and that if illegal methods are tolerated when resorted to for the punishment of the guilty they may be employed subsequently to the disadvantage of the innocent. And so when a verdict is set aside in the case of a man of whose guilt the public is convinced the judgment of the public is that there has been a little more of undue meddlesomeness on the part of the appellate judges. As a consequence the impression prevails that the machinery of justice is so imperfect that it is difficult to punish the guilty, especially the guilty that have the money to employ legal talent. And yet it is shown by statistics that have been gathered by one of the professors of Berkeley University (not Boke) that the percentage of verdicts that have been set aside in this State is comparatively small. Furthermore, the decisions of our appellate courts show that instead of being intent upon finding technicalties to serve as a foundation for setting verdicts aside they have been rather inclined to stultify themselves in their eagerness to justify verdicts in cases that were not tried with a strict regard for all the rights of the accused. The truth of the matter is that among the trial judges of this State are men in whom there is no symptom of the judicial temperament. It is exasperating to observe the eagerness of these men to "cinch" accused persons and prove themselves smarter than the attorneys for the defense, heedless the while of remote issues, unconscious of the most mischievous, if not the basest, of all crimes which they commit when, sitting in the seat of Justice they make a mockery of the chief of the virtues. How much better it would be were these judges sensible of the fact that the escape of a guilty man is of the very slightest consequence compared with loss of confidence in the judicial system which they tend to create by conducting trials in a manner that renders verdicts worthless? In the long run there would be fewer miscarriages of justice were the trial judges more eager to have their verdicts sustained than to acquire the reputation of being able to thwart astute counsel and to become noted for their severity toward the criminal class. No matter how able a judge may be, if instead of being temperamentally disposed to act with impartiality he is inclined to co-operate with the prosecution it will not be easy for him to avoid falling into fatal errors. Singularly enough one seldom hears criticism of the trial judges who espouse the side of the prosecution, and yet it is no secret that we have men of this character on the Bench. Hovering by no means dim in the retentive memory of many is the well-authenticated story of a local judge who winked to special counsel for the prosecution in a murder case thus to inform him surreptitiously that the professional juror under examination was a puppet of the court's, and could be depended upon to stand for conviction. And this is but one of many incidents that illustrate the character of men that are engaged in administering justice in our trial courts, and that have brought more or less opprobrium on our appellate courts by sending to them verdicts which conscience compelled them to set aside. A matter of common notoriety in this city is the rivalry stimulated among certain judges of the criminal department whenever there is a sensational case about to be assigned, one that is likely to draw large crowds and hold public interest. Equally notorious was the practice of one of the judges with reference to appeals from his court which he discontinued after being repeatedly rebuked. It was the practice of following the appeals to the higher tribunal and attempting to elaborate the record orally, without the knowledge of counsel for the defense, in the hope of palliating errors and conciliating the judges whose duty it was to determine whether he had followed the law. A very zealous judge, this one; not less zealous for his own reputation than for the interests of the dear people who love him and who have been very much incensed at times under sinister promptings against the appellate courts. It is only fair to say, however, that he is not typical. He is in a class by himself. But the inspiration of his conduct is not peculiar. It is the inspiration that aggravates the responsibilities of our appellate courts and makes the course of justice seem unduly tortuous.

The Power of Suggestion

By Dr. Albert Abrams

The influence of the mind over the body is a subject which is now receiving much attention from scientists. As will be seen from Dr. Abrams' article there is no hostility in the contemporary physician's attitude toward what goes by the name of mental influence in the treatment of disease. The most enlightened physicians regard mental healing as they would any other remedial agency. But they practice it from the scientific standpoint.—Editor's Note.

This is an age of commercialism, and the utilitarian exploitation of the mind emphasizes the cogency of my exordium. As yet sunbeams have not been extracted out of cucumbers, but the chimera of the alchemist has been surpassed by his legitimate descendant, the mental scientist who can transmute magnetism into gold. The mind which inhabits the body operates powerfully in health and disease with its strong passions and vivid imaginations. The average patient with his enervated nerves is not so much concerned about what he has as by what he thinks he has. The patient is seldom right; in imaginary diseases he believes too much, and in real diseases he does not believe enough. Quacks live and fatten on what the legitimate physician wastes. The quack recognizes the psychologic aspect of disease which some physicians studiously ignore. The therapeutics of the imagination, or force of mind over body, is the real secret of quackery. The natural tendency of disease toward recovery has in all ages engendered the creation of popular delusions, for there is no folly however absurd which will not secure a following. Carlyle said that there were about forty millions of persons in England, mostly fools; therefore it is understandable where the sustenance of the faith-curist originates. The Eddyist has by no means pre-empted the field of occultism; his rivals are rapidly multiplying as vitiopaths, phrenopathists, vibrationists, metaphysical healers, etc. Their number would be further augmented were it not for the difficulty in inventing appropriate names to dignify their delusions. There may be a little good in all exclusive systems, but there is always a preponderance of evil. The true physician strives to eliminate the evil and absorb the good. All faith cures can be accounted for by the effect of the mind upon the body. The suggestion of cure is primarily conveyed to the subject by the operator and his method is only a vehicle for such suggestion. The reaction is the idea of cure, in accordance with the law, that every idea if left to itself, will generate its actuality. Normal suggestion has always been employed by the physician for the cure of disease. Perhaps not with the assiduity which it truly deserves, for psycho-therapeutics must now be regarded as an integral part of medical practice. Heretofore, the physician has employed suggestion as a mere dilettante, his conservatism prompting him to eschew a practice which might jeopardize his professional reputation or would perchance effect some moral or mental injury to the patient. The physician is now compelled to recognize a mental factor in the cure of disease. He must not entrust it to an unlettered small-knowing soul. Man is endowed with a dual mentality. The mind is one, but a part of it is always conscious and another part is never illuminated by consciousness. These two minds are known as the objective and subjective minds. The former or the supra-conscious mind takes cognizance of the objective world through the senses and represents the supreme function of reasoning; in other words it is the mind of intelligence. With the subjective or subconscious mind, one's environment is recognized independent of the senses; it perceives by intuition. It executes the highest functions when the senses are in abeyance. Consciousness is not co-extensive with the mind and the entire business of mental functions could go on without consciousness, just as the machinery of a clock might work without a dial. The healing of nature is best experienced when intelligence is in abeyance, and it is for this reason that the cure of disease is a more difficult task with intelligent than with the ignorant classes. If physicians could decapitate their patients, the treatment of disease could be simplified. The story is related of a patient who, receiving a prescription from his physician, was told that it would do him a power of good. At the patient's next visit he was asked if he took his medicine regularly. The patient replied that it was unnecessary. He had swallowed the prescription according to directions and it had done him a power of good. It is a fact, that what is obvious can rarely be brought into successful competition with what is vague or obscure in the treatment of disease. The mind can do all sorts of curious things with the body. We know that through the power of suggestion one can produce burns or wounds. In several cases recorded in literature bleeding from the hands and feet and sides could be evoked suggesting the Crucifixion of the Saviour. Innumerable cases are recorded in literature of the influence of the mind in producing death, and as far as the influence of the mind in curing disease is concerned, we recall that Elijah healed a dead child by stretching himself upon the dead body and calling upon the name of the Lord. The kings of England and France restored the sick by laying on of the hands. Mental healing is best explained by acknowledging the two planes of the consciousness of man—the subjective and objective minds. The objective or waking mind directs consciousness and has the power of reason, whereas the other mind incapable of reasoning accepts unreservedly any suggestion which it receives. A judicious analysis of the mind cures of today shows that their invariable primitive origin is through the power of suggestion and that the original method of Mesmer is merely clothed in a new garb for the benefit of the occultist. The physician who judiciously employs hypnotism in the treatment of disease can more easily eradicate a morbid idea or substitute a good one than by any so-called pseudo-mental method. The latter substitutes ignorance for intelligence and so distorts personal consciousness as to create a condition of temporary insanity. The dangers of hypnotism are exaggerated for no one can be hypnotized against his wish. It was supposed at one time that only weak and hysterical women were susceptible to hypnotism, but statistics have shown that almost anybody can be hypnotized; the susceptibility of suggestion being influenced by willingness of the subject, his passivity, and the power to concentrate thought before attempting sleep. The writer sees no reason why physicians should continue to submit humbly to the blatant effrontery of the quack, and he hopes that his profession will have recourse to this powerful weapon against some diseases which for some unfounded reason has been discredited.

It has been asserted that hypnotism may be attended by harmful results. This is not true of its use but only of its abuse. Like sophistry would proscribe drugs. With morphine you may kill a person, yet the judicious employment of that same drug is one of the most beneficent gifts that humanity has ever known.

The City That Is

Wherein the Citizen of the City That Was Fails to Find Congenial Environment Amid the New Conditions That Have Ensued Upon Our Post-Calamity Rehabilitation.

By Democritus

It is a common assertion of loyal San Franciscans that the city of their pride is different from all others on the planet. In the old days, before the calamity, this declaration was vain-glorious and boastful; now it is despondent and regretful.

San Francisco is still different from all other cities, but it is a different kind of difference from that which made it sui generis in the good old days when the worst was better than the best that flows turgidly from the changed conditions.

The city itself is all right. It is still a queen among cities; but as there are queens and queens, so San Francisco is not the queen she was "before the fire." It seems to me that this city of the far western verge has degenerated into a huckstering lady of commerce, striving to be rich beyond the dreams of avarice rather than joyous beyond the measure of ordinary earthly happiness. In the old days we lived to enjoy life; in these later times we strive to enjoy life because we insist upon living. In the bright backward and expanse of our career we were spontaneous, hospitable, generous, wholehearted; now we are spasmodic, grasping, cautious, self-interested, sordid. The city is destined to "unprecedented prosperity"; it has a "glorious future"; but the people who live in the city are steadily becoming another sort among whom the "old timers" are as strangers in a strange land—like Ruth "when, sick for home, she stood in tears amid the alien corn."

It was a brave carouse, but this second marriage in our house divorces the Daughter of the Vine and takes old barren Reason to spouse. We take the cash and let the credit go. We sigh "that Spring should vanish with the Rose! that Youth's sweet-scented manuscript should close!" We feel that our day is done; for we know that a new generation has usurped the privilege of the old and that the genius of the place has been evicted from his favorite haunts. It was not an abdiction; it was a deposition; the barbarian came and conquered; he invaded our temples, he profaned our shrines, he laid sacrilegious hands on our idols and he cast them down, not knowing their sanctity, nor caring if he had known.

It is a difference of temperament. In the old days we were not concerned about the affairs of our neighbors; we never inquired as to the magnitude of his bank-roll, the quality of his family pedigree, the name he bore before he left Texas or Montana, or why he ceased so suddenly to live there. It was sufficient for us if he was companionable, intellectually our peer, and paid his debts as they were contracted—if he was "broke" but otherwise eligible it was of little moment to us, he was welcome to the joyous freedom of the city. In those days the "remittance man" was a familiar personage in the corridors of our hotels, and his promise to pay was "good" at the cash desk of our cafes and places of public resort. And seldom was our confidence misplaced; but oftentimes we entertained the inevitable angel unawares. Robert Louis Stevenson starved in our city because he would not ask for bread, but when we came to know him we gave full appreciation of his manly qualities, his quaint and winning personality and the humor of his understanding. I take Robert Louis Stevenson as the objective of our old-time appreciation of that which is worth while. We didn't go about seeking the things we desired; we knew that we should find them without seeking—that they would come to us as the sunshine comes, as the trade winds come, as the fog-wraiths drift around the summits of our seven hills, as the ships float up out of the glamor and romance of the Orient, as all things come to those who know how to wait, but employ their hours while waiting with congenial tasks and pleasant pastimes.

So it happened that those of us who had learned the real worth of Robert Louis Stevenson erected a monument to his memory in the place where he loved to sit and watch the flow of San Francisco's cosmopolitan humanity, care free in those days because there was naught to disturb the even tenor of its way. It was a deserved and worthy tribute to the man rather than an appreciation of the genius whose fame had rung round the world—that galleon in Portsmouth square freighted with love in place of ingots.

How different would be his impression now if Robert Louis Stevenson could once more sit on that bench in Portsmouth square musing upon the passing throng in the motley of all nations. Now the crowd hurries by where once it was wont to stroll lingeringly; now the eyes of the multitude are wide open to glimpse the slightest hint of the main chance; the feet of the people are swift to pursue the fugacious five-franc piece; the minds of the throng are alert to hear that brief and scarcely audible summons of Opportunity. There is a dollar madness in the new environment, and an epidemic of the gold fever. We have learned to hoard and we have forgotten how to squander. In the elder time sufficient for the day was the evil thereof—for when the night came we put aside the thought of mere gain and gave ourselves to dreams of what the money would buy of things that make life worth living. Now we think more of tomorrow than we think of today, and we try to profit by the evil of yesterday. We are a material folk and a mercenary. We go about wondering what is in the pocket of our neighbor and devising a method of extracting it. The very atmosphere we breathe is different; it is cold, and bleak and inhospitable;—even our climate is inglorious.

Call it a threnody, if you will; a requiem if you please—the old queen is dead; sad to say, "Long live the queen!" What a beautiful creature she was! enthroned above the sun-kissed sea beside the bay of Portola, her golden hair streaming to the winds of old ocean, her cheek tinged with the olive of Spain, her laughing eyes limpid with their laughter, joyous always, reckless of what might befall because hopeful of all things to make life worth the living—perpetual sunshine, sweet music, soft winds fragrant with the perfume of flowers, fruits of the earth surpassingly luscious and savory,—greeting the dawn with hymns of praise, glad when the sun of noon was overhead, merry when the stars were a-twinkle in the midnight sky, singing the melodies of the West to the lilt of the song of the East as old Omar sang:

> "Ah, fill the Cup: what boots it to repeat
> How Time is slipping underneath our feet;
> Unborn To-morrow, and dead Yesterday,
> Why fret about them if To-day be sweet?"

How desolate she was in her sackcloth amid her ashes! How disheveled and woe-begone, clinging to the ruins of her throne above the sun-kissed sea beside the bay of valorous Gaspar, her cheek gray with the pallor of fear, her eyes red with gazing into the fires of wrath, the melody of her voice a discord and all her joy turned to the bitter dregs of woe!

And now that she has girded up her bruised loins and clothed herself anew, resolved that not fire nor earthquake nor any calamity shall daunt her high purpose; even now in her newer life she seems another queen—not the gladsome creature sitting regnant on her seven hills; but a cold, calculating, sophisticated stranger-woman of another age and another land.

It is not the same—this new San Francisco; and it will never be the same for the passing generation of her children who knew her of old and loved her because she was beautiful and joyous and free-handed as she was free-hearted. Call it a threnody, if you will; a requiem if it so pleases you, for it is a regret for the queen that is dead—let those who wish cry, "Long live the queen!"

In Exile

From the German of Henry Kistemaekers

I was going down into my cabin when a rather elegant but melancholy-looking passenger—I had noticed him during dinner—approached me on the upper deck.

"A beautiful night, isn't it?" he remarked.

"Extraordinarily beautiful!"

"Do you land in Alexandria?"

"Yes, tomorrow morning."

"We touch there about daybreak. As you will see for yourself, the picture of Alexandria as it takes shape in the golden and rosy glow of an Egyptian daybreak is a sight like some enchanting fairy scene. I know nothing so beautiful, so graceful as this city of Aphrodite, poised like a jewel casket on the edge of the desert. Truly Alexandria is beautiful; it is like some hymn of light. There is only one spot in the world that is more bewitching, and that is Paris! Do you know Paris?"

"Just as I thought—I felt it. Even blindfold I can single out a Parisian in any crowd."

He leaned over the ship's railing, watching the phosphorescent arabesques that formed in the wake of the boat. Then he murmured: "What a happy man you are!"

He turned suddenly on me, his eyes flashing wildly, and fixed his gaze steadily on me. "You are an extremely fortunate mortal—you do not realize your good fortune. You have before you a man who adores Paris; one who has Paris in his blood, in his veins—and one who will never see Paris again. Can you imagine anything more ghastly?"

"Are you exiled?" I queried.

In a tone that was most matter-of-fact he answered: "Far worse than that. I am dead!"

My features must have betrayed my sensations at such a confidence, for he added rapidly: "Don't be frightened; you are not confronted by a maniac. Don't look up at the rigging so anxiously; you are in absolutely no danger, for I am the sanest and most peaceable man in the world. My story will prove it—of course, you must guess that there is a story to tell, inas much as I claim to be dead and you see me here alive in the stern of this packet boat. Have you five minutes' time to give to me?"

I thought it best to humor him and nodded assent, seating myself on one of the deck benches.

He lit a cigar, placed himself opposite me, and began: "Have you ever heard the name Saint Mai?"

"I know not only the name but also the works of that great master," I answered. "Are you going to tell me something about him?"

"Exactly—about the famous Saint Mai, author of 'Heracles,' the thousandth performance of which took place last night; about the creator of 'Marie,' and 'The Woman of the Sabots'—in short, of all those works that have had such tremendous success in the last ten years. I want to tell you about Saint Mai, who died without having tasted of fame—"

"Well, what about him?"

"Only that it is all a mistake and that Saint Mai is alive. Don't look so surprised, for it is just as true that he is alive as that I am here before you. In fact, the cases are one and the same, for Saint Mai and I are one and the same person."

"Oh!" I cried, and my voice sounded my alarm.

"True! It was just about ten years ago that I began to vegetate. A concert of my compositions had been noticed with the most prominent indifference; my opera, 'Marie,' had flattened its nose against the portals of the Opera Comique, and bore the honor of having been the greatest failure since that of 'Carmen' was recorded in the annals of modern French music. My portfolio was bulging with unpublished works, and I withdrew to a small corner of Brittany to ruminate over my fate and to economize in my expenditures. It was during this retirement that one fine morning I got hold of a Paris newspaper and discovered in it the announcement that I was dead! A laconic despatch from some news agency brought the information that I had been shipwrecked in a bark. I have never been able to discover the motive of the news correspondent who reported me dead; but as a matter of fact this incident decided my career."

"How is that possible?"

"Let me proceed: When I read this news item the first impulse that arose in me was to race to some telegraph station and contradict the report. The nearest telegraph office was four miles from my place of seclusion. On the road there I pondered the matter and realized that it would cost me one sou per word to contradict the report, and that a telegram would have to be sent to each one of the ten prominent Paris newspapers. The total cost of all this telegraphing would have made a fearful hole in my meagre purse. As I considered these things I gazed out upon the ocean from the high cliff, and the thought flashed across my mind: It might be a very interesting thing to discover just how much of an event my death would be, and what would be said about me after my death. So I decided to wait until the following day before recalling the news.

"Without burdening you with a lot of details, let me assure you that I had a magnificent lot of press agents. Some of my intimate friends tried to besmirch me with mud by spreading some evil reports about my private life; but they only succeeded in raising me in the estimation of those people who had not known me personally, and the latter praised me to the skies. Within comparatively few hours I was made an object of most tender consideration. I became the subject of laudatory magazine articles—they are not very difficult to write, for the formula is ready at hand and there exist numberless phrases that were coined at the time of Bizet's death and are still available as models. In short, it was unhesitatingly asserted that I had been a genius. My opera, 'Marie,' which had been a failure, was hurriedly put on the boards again and had a tremendous success. At the Paris Grand Opera, in the archives of which the score of 'Heracles' had been slumbering, every effort was made to produce that work—and at its premiere it was frantically applauded.

"Meanwhile I was still in Brittany. I had come to realize my position and did not dare risk endangering my successes by breaking the silence. I was mightily

The Spectator

A Poet for Portola

My esteemed contemporary, Miss Fraser, of the Examiner, suggests that Joaquin Miller, the poet of the Sierra, be selected to personate Gaspar de Portola in the fiesta to be held in this city next October in commemoration of the alleged discovery of San Francisco bay by the ancient Spaniard. It is a good suggestion; one of the best that has been made in this connection since we began to nominate candidates for this honor. I see no reason why the poet should not be chosen to reincarnate the old soldier, except that he is not like Gaspar in anything. Miller is not a soldier and has never been a soldier; Portola was not a poet and never, as far as I have been able to discover, even attempted to write poetry. Miller is tall, tawny-maned, and bearded like the pard; Portola was undersized, raven-haired and wore a fierce moustache. Still I see no objection to Miller for our Portola. It doesn't really matter that we should preserve the historical verities, except, perhaps in the detail of costume—our Portola should wear clothes similar to those which old Gaspar had on when he is supposed to have discovered our bay. It isn't probable that anyone now living knows what kind of uniform the Spaniard wore on his first visit to the site of our city but there are pictures of eighteenth century costumes of every kind and it will be easy to fake one for the impersonator of Gaspar de Portola—the impersonator must do the rest. It is generally conceded that Captain Portola was as lean as Cassius, and while Poet Miller is long of limb and not over fleshed he is not really lean; but nobody will cavil at that; besides, any make-up artist can make Miller look as lean as Don Quixote. I will accept Miss Fraser's candidate if my own choice is impossible. I wanted Ned Hamilton because I believe he fills every requisite of a Portola impersonation. However any spare-ribbed candidate will serve better than one who is built like Falstaff or Sancho Panza. A fat Portola would be an affront upon the truth of history. Fat men and those who sleep o' nights may have suited the taste of Caesar, but they are not the sort from which to select a Gaspar de Portola for San Francisco's great historical fete. Let fat men boss the job but give us lean men for the picturesque features of the show, and the leaner the better.

Let Us Give Him a Monument

Another matter that ought to be looked after by the committee in charge of the fiesta is the re-location of the place where Don Gaspar stood when he discovered the bay of San Francisco. I think this detail of our celebration is quite important. And afterwards we ought to erect a heroic statue or a towering monument at the least on the historic spot. Just as some day the nations ought to place a statue upon a peak in Darien to commemorate the great discovery of Balboa when with eagle eyes he stared at the Pacific, and, as Keats tells us "all his men looked at each other with a wild surmise." It will be easy to find the probable view point. And since we have insisted that it was Portola and not Ortega and his deer hunters who first saw the bay of San Francisco there should be no difficulty in locating the spot on which he stood when he made his discovery. For myself I maintain that Portola did not discover San Francisco bay, and I deny that there is the smallest historical proof of such discovery by the Spanish captain; but I am hopelessly in the minority and as the fact is of no great importance I magnanimously permit the majority to have it their own way. But I do suggest that if this majority would perpetuate the falsity of their history they should select the coign from which their apochryphal discoverer made his mythical discovery; to the end that doubters yet unborn may be confounded by the visible proof of the history we are about to make.

"Then, if you were to receive an anonymous letter making accusations against your wife, you would pay no attention to it?"
"Certainly not. I wouldn't even open it."

A New Book Enterprise

"Charles William Eliot, for forty years President of Harvard University, has undertaken to lend his experience and his intelligence to collecting in fifty volumes such of the world's literature as he deems most useful for Americans." This is the announcement of the editor of Collier's Weekly. "That collection," he adds, "we are to have the satisfaction of presenting to the world." Aside from the fact that editions of "the world's best literature" have long since become a drug on the market, to put out an edition which shall purport to be for the special edification and instruction of Americans is to bait the public somewhat after the manner of the manufacturers of quack nostrums who are supposed to be the pet aversion of the sacrosanct firm of P. F. Collier & Son. Harvard's ex-President might be engaged in better business than that of supplying a new pretext for the ingenious book-agent who goes about ingratiating himself with the unwary by means of confidence game deceptions and making of himself a very offensive nuisance.

The Futility of His Reading

While describing in detail the laudable and beneficent purpose of Dr. Eliott the editor of Collier's takes occasion to instruct the readers of that journal in the matter of what to read and how to read. He tells us that an American "must have read with small intelligence if he has never found in Emerson, Webster, Lincoln and Franklin words that enlighten, lift or stir"; also, that "to admire the orations against Catiline and not the speech at Gettysburg is to belong with the dust upon the shelves." These shrewd observations made no impression on me until I read a paragraph from the pen of the same editor, in the same issue of the weekly, dealing with the House of Lords, which he characterized as "a decorative and at times humorous institution." Then I was impelled to reflection. Of what benefit has reading been to this pompous preacher of the tripod? I asked myself. Surely not with any great degree of intelligence have the master minds of literature and of state craft been read by him that regards the House of Lords as nothing more than a decorative and humorous institution. If there is a man that belongs with the dust on the shelves it is he that has read Emerson, Webster, Lincoln and Franklin, and perhaps Hamilton and Jefferson, without coming to a realization of the dignity and worth of the House of Lords as a political institution. No man has read to advantage in whom bigotry and intolerance are characteristics. Of what has his reading availed the editor of Collier's if he can appreciate none but Republican institutions?

The Solicitudes of Peers

It appears that the Earl of Dartmouth and Lord Willoughby de Boke were responsible for the sneer indulged in by the editor of Collier's. Motoring was recently the subject of discussion in the House of Lords and the Earl of Dartmouth said that he always gave instructions to his driver "to go round a corner with the expectation of finding on the wrong side of the road an old lady in a governess cart." Lord Willoughby de Boke complained of the noise that is made by motorists with their horns, saying that they arrogate to themselves the privileges of the fire engine. Now let us ponder the sentiments that provoked the sneer of our democratic friend of the national weekly. They are worth pondering, emanating as they do from hereditary peers, born and bred in the atmosphere of a constitutional monarchy, where there is much less talk of liberty than in this glorious Republic. The Earl of Dartmouth, it appears, has some concern for the rights of others. He motors with caution, fearful of doing an injury. How about the millionaire members of our House of Lords, the United States Senate, chosen for their exalted duties by the liberty-loving people instead of being born to their jobs? Are they always mindful of the fact that the principle of liberty guaranteed by the Constitution should prevail even on the boulevard and that it is not strictly observed when pedestrians are constantly put in peril of life and limb? Do they feel as Lord Willoughby de Boke feels—that the man who owns an automobile is not entitled to the privilege of the fire engine? The editor of Collier's probably believes that Lord Willoughby de Boke is an ass because he objects to horns. Now the horn is really responsible for the great majority of automobile accidents. The average driver, relying on his horn, assumes that it is the duty of pedestrians to keep out of his path, and rather than slow down he splits the circumambient. There are chauffeurs that seldom toot a horn, but they drive on the theory that it is their duty to avoid accidents. When they come to a crossing or to a turn in the road they slow down. This is as it should be, especially in a country that boasts of the liberty which its citizens enjoy. Nowadays the pedestrian, or the driver of a horse, finds that his liberty is at the discretion of automobilists.

She—How you have changed! Before we were married you used to say there was no one like me.

He—Yes, and I say so still.

Down With Lackmann!

The Municipal League of Republican Clubs was for a time considering the advisability of nominating John Lackmann for mayor, but the Boughten Bulletin, echoing the sentiments of the Hon. James D. Phelan and the Hon. Rudolph Spreckels, pronounced that gentleman unfit because of "his close affiliations" with friends of William F. Herrin. In the circumstances, and in view of our parochial limitations, the unfitness of Mr. Lackmann from the standpoint of the longest leased journal is not to be questioned. It is not to be urged in extenuation of Mr. Lackmann's fatal friendship that his honesty and ability have been vindicated in public office, but in view of the objection that has been raised and the source thereof it may be instructive to revive recollections of the remote past, of the days when Mr. Lackmann's affiliations were not regarded as a bar to political preferment. In the old days when Mr. Lackmann, a humble grocer as he is still is, was active in politics, he numbered Mr. Phelan among his friends. Although a Republican, so conspicuous had been his honesty amid the corruption of a shameless board of supervisors that he received the endorsement of a Democratic convention controlled by Mr. Phelan. It was thus that Mr. Phelan, who was the idol of the people, engaged in building up the political machine with which he expected to hoist himself up to the United States Senate, vindicated his sincerity as a civic patriot. The endorsement of Mr. Lackmann was proof of Mr. Phelan's non-partisanship. With that native cunning for which our Jimmy has been distinguished since boyhood, he dedicated the prestige of Mr. Lackmann to the great glory of Mr. Phelan. But in the course of time this Phelan-Lackmann "affiliation" proved injurious to the gallant young millionaire. Lackmann became a candidate for sheriff on the Republican ticket, and received the endorsement of a Non-Partisan convention which was controlled by Mr. Phelan. The Democratic candidate for sheriff was a Mr. Deasy, the father of the young man who is now known to fame as "the blanket search warrant judge." Mr. Deasy with one nomination was beaten by Mr. Lackmann with two. Then the friends of Mr. Deasy went up the street and down the street execrating "Michael Feeney" Phelan as they called him. They told it in Gath and they published it in the streets of Askalon that Jimmy had given one of his father's countrymen the double-cross for the benefit of a German grocer. As Mr. Deasy's friends were members of powerful Irish societies the friendship of which Mr. Phelan had been cultivating in season and out of season, with blarney and with buncombe, his emotions were painfully agitated by the charge that was propagated. But the gallant patriot never loses his head. He sent for Deasy and offered to make him a member of the Election Commission. The offer was accepted and the dogs of war were locked up. The Deasy family has been taken care of ever since, but the German grocer, "Honest" John Lackmann is no longer receiving Phelan endorsements. His current affiliations are fatal and he hasn't the pleasure of "Gumshoe" Burns' acquaintance. Long live the parochial spirit of the great city of San Francisco! May those that foster it thrive and their enemies perish!

Modern Thought Transference

The ingenuity of man is well illustrated in one of his methods of transmitting thought. I take the Calhoun case for an example. At eleven o'clock on Tuesday a lawyer for the defense uttered a thought for the consideration of the jury; half an hour after the word was spoken it was in the mind of a man traveling on a ferryboat to Oakland. If that statement were made in a tale of the Arabian Nights it would be believed by little children, but wise men would classify it with the nature-faking yarns of Sindbad the Sailor and the story of Aladdin's flying palace. Yet the process, though circuitous, was simple enough in detail and differing from a tale of the Arabian Nights only in the fact that it is not necessary to ascribe its accomplishment to an afrit or some other supernatural agency. The lawyer uttered the thought; a stenographer heard the thought and inscribed it on a sheet of paper in a sound symbol; then the stenographer carried the symbol to a graphophone where he repeated it through a tube upon a waxen cylinder revolving rapidly. This impression of the stenographer's voice was conveyed to another graphophone attached to a tube leading to the ears of a man at a typewriter. The cylinder revolved again, this time emitting the sound that it had received from the stenographer, and the man at the typewriter printed it in another symbol on another sheet of paper. A boy carried the typewritten paper to a printing office where it was taken in hand by a man at a linotype machine and the words symbolizing the thought transferred to a leaden type in a different symbol which was carried to a printing press and again transferred to a sheet of paper which another boy carried out into the street and sold to a man for a nickel. The man read the newspaper and was immediately as fully informed of what the lawyer had said to the jury as if he had been in the courtroom and heard the words as they fell from the lips of the advocate. And the curious thing of it all is that the thought was forgotten as soon as it was transferred from one brain to the other in the process of transmission from the lawyer to the man in the street. It was forgotten by the stenographer in the mass of words that he took that day from the lips of the lawyers; it was forgotten by the man at the typewriter in the ocean of words he absorbed during the day; it was forgotten by the printer as soon as he had struck the line. The boys that conveyed the message were unconscious of their precious burden. And finally I am not sure that the lawyer remembered what he said, five minutes after he said it; and I am pretty sure that the man in the street forgot what he read as soon as he turned to the page of sports.

Venality of the British Reporter

I suppose the insatiate curiosity of the reading public is somewhat gratified by the tragedy of a liaison between the daughter of a boilermaker and the great grandson of a vegetable peddler. I refer to the Vanderbilt-Ruiz affair. For my part I am chiefly interested in the purchaseability of those London newspapermen. It is said that one of them accepted $50 to suppress his report of the coroner's inquest upon Madame Ruiz. Imagine an American reporter doing such a thing! It is bad enough to have it thrust upon us in the sentimental drama in the guise of a stage reporter who sacrifices a beautiful scoop to win the plaudits of the clapperclawing groundlings, as when the reporter for the New York World in "The Bishop's Carriage" tears up his notes of a scandal in high life and dashes them to the floor of the Central Police Station exclaiming, "Now as heaven shall be me reward, this exclusive story shall never by MY hand bring the blush of shame to the cheek of Mag the shoplifter"; but it would be far worse if, in real life, a fifteen-dollar-a-week police reporter should accept the wad of a millionaire in return for suppressing the news that the millionaire had violated the speed ordinance while rioting around the town in a drunken and disorderly manner. I don't believe that American newspapermen of the reporter class can be bribed; and I know that if the city editor should discover that one of his reporters had suppressed a good story for a beggarly $50 he would fire the fellow on the instant. Newspapermen in this country have probably accepted money for suppressing and also for disseminating the news, but they were not reporters. And hereafter, when I hear some Englishman boasting of the incorruptibility of the British press I shall take fiendish delight in refuting his statement by citing the case of the London reporter who confessed that he sold himself to the agent of a Vanderbilt for the measly price of a ten pun note. American newspapermen have been accused of many crimes indigenous to the newspaper profession; but I think I am safe in the assertion that venal crimes are not among them in the ranks of the profession.

Says He is Not a "Wizard"

Luther Burbank denies that he is a "wizard," and explicitly he repudiates the title of "wizard of horticulture." Too late, Luther; too late. You should have made this denial in the beginning of your newspaper notoriety. It was then that you should have nipped this thing in the bud, horticulturally speaking. You are not a "wizard" and nobody thinks you are a "wizard"; but we have been so often told by newspaper correspondents and magazine writers and eulogists and panegyrists that you are a "wizard" that we have become familiar with the appellation as it has been applied to you; and we find it extremely difficult to think of you otherwise than as a "wizard." It is too late to reform; the die is cast; all hope must be abandoned; you have been a "wiz" since we have known you and you will be a "wiz" until you are niched in the temple of fame. Your obituaries will call you a "wizard," and unless you give express orders to your executors your tombstone will bear that nominal adjective in place of your surname which we have almost forgotten, so much are we in the habit of naming you "Wizard" Burbank. It is personally gratifying, however, to see the worm turn at last; for I recall that mine was the first protest uttered against this absurd and wholly misleading appellation.

The Parting of the Ways

My contemporary the editor of the Globe has been extracting a vast amount of amusement out of the newspaper row that he occasioned last week. The gratification that it affords him entitles him to felicitation. But he is in error if he supposes that the pleasure is all his. This is the season of the year when almost any kind of joke goes a long way, and the joke that excited the risibles of the Globe's editor was an exceptionally good joke inasmuch as it was sufficiently broad to cover both the Call and the Bulletin. It was what might be designated as a transitive joke passing as it did from the nominative to the objective and back again. How preposterous it was for the senile hetaira of journalism to pillory the bedragged bawd merely because she was detected in the act of lying about the earnings of prostitution and the loot of crime. "Why cannot the Bulletin be honest in its declarations?" asked the Call,—as if the Call didn't know. Frenzied at the swift loss of circulation, the penalty of persistency in shameful hypocrisy, the Boughten Bulletin assuming that its prosperous contemporaries, the Chronicle and Examiner, would heed not its patent misrepresentations and that the decadent Call would not dare to expose the wantoness of a slum sister, published some false figures designed to give the impression that the Phelan-Spreckels evening journal is the best patronized of all advertizing mediums. This was too much for the Call. Like the thunderbolt from a clear sky, in language as intemperate as its subject, came the Call's blast of denunciation. Cordial relations were at an end. The Boughten Bulletin was branded for the Ananias Club by its rival in prevarication. Is anything funnier conceivable? The pen scrambles about in vain for similes and tropes to celebrate this luminous disjunction. I can think of nothing better than the episode of the pot and the kettle.

Confirmed in Iniquity

The row between the Call and the Bulletin is of no particular interest to the general public. The statement made by the Call that "The San Francisco Bulletin constantly publishes garbled and misleading statements of its advertising" cannot properly be classified as news. The boughten journal lies about everything as freely and unblushingly as about its advertising. And though it should tell the truth about the volume of its advertising it would still be misleading, for according to the Hon. Julius Kahn and the Hon. Charles Wesley Reed, gentlemen whose reputation for veracity has never been impeached, all advertising that is done in the Bulletin does not represent voluntary effort at obtaining publicity on the part of the firms that fatten the Crothers bank account. From public rostrums those gentlemen have described the sinister and unholy methods of the Bulletin. Mr. Kahn has painted both the editor and proprietor as blackmailers and bolstered out his bold and sensational charge with a wealth of convincing detail. Typewritten copies of the Kahn speech are accessible to the curious of whom there are perhaps not many, for it is pretty generally known that the Bulletin is the most adjustable of journals even in a period of swift mutation. It has been on all sides of all questions and if worth while it will take sides with no one against anybody. It is conducted by men who have no subconsciousness and no time for introspection. Their business is to promote cant and develop humbugs and they aren't even aware that the cloven hoof is discernible beneath their gown of respectability.

Edward Everett Hale

With the death of Edward Everett Hale the last of the old school of New Englanders has passed away. But there was little in common between Hale and such men as Emerson, Thoreau and Channing. When Hale was in college he was one of the few students who read a daily paper, and he habitually read four novels a week in addition. He has been writing so long that the present generation hardly knows even the names of his books, much less their contents, though a perusal of them would be by no means time wasted. The order of King's Daughters, with its emblem, the little plain silver cross, had its origin in his "Ten Times One are Ten." His "Man Without a Country" will live as long as the nation itself. Though a bit of pure fiction, the author had the doubtful pleasure of reading many letters written by persons who represented themselves to be friends of Philip Nolan. The story which first attracted attention to Dr. Hale was that whimsical conceit, "My Double and How He Undid Me," in which he points out the absolutely unnecessary drain that is made on a clergyman's time. The scientists who are so anxious to hold communion with the planet Mars might think their own ideas satirized if they were to turn back to "His Level Best" and read of the brick moon constructed by some despairing submerged ones who, concluding that the earth was overcrowded, decided to build a new world for themselves. By accident their incomplete sphere was launched into space carrying with it a portion of its intended inhabitants who established communication with those from whom they had been separated by leaping up and down on the bright nights, the difference in the force of gravity making it possible to leap to surprising heights, and in time the inhabitants of the earth grasped the idea that the long and short jumps were intended to represent the dots and dashes of the Morse code.

Some Hale Anecdotes

Dr. Hale has been for many years chaplain of the United States Senate, and though he was far from being a joker in his clerical capacity he could and did enjoy a joke on the clergy as well as any layman. One of his favorite stories was of a senator who brought his young son to visit the capital taking him, among other places, to the Senate gallery. He pointed out the various celebrities, the chaplain among the rest. "He prays for the Senate, doesn't he?" asked the boy. "No, my son," said the politician. "He takes a look at the Senate and then he prays for the country." It is related that some one said to him one day, "It seems to me there are a good many old men in the Senate." "Old men?" said Hale, "I hadn't noticed it. The only reasonably mature men about here are the senators from Alabama." Dr. Hale was himself eighty-five at the time of the conversation, and of the two senators from Alabama, Pettus was eighty-four and Morgan eighty-two. An Oregon editor traveling in the backwoods of that State a few years ago, applied to a little inn for lodging and was surprised to see a large framed picture of Dr. Hale hanging on the wall. The woman of the house explained it thus: "Well, you see, a good many strangers come here and want me to keep them, but I don't know anything about them. If they know Edward Everett Hale's picture I know they're good for something and I let them stay."

Harried by the Women

If you are a man and live in Oakland you will find that the female of your species has little regard for any rights, privileges or immunities which you may think you possess. There is nothing that is man's which the Oakland woman holds herself bound to respect. The other day she complained to the Oakland Traction Company that men were smoking pipes, cigars and especially cigarettes on the rear platforms of the cars, and she demanded that this nuisance be abated. When the Oakland woman commands there is nothing for the Oakland public utilitarian to do but to obey. The smokers on the cars of the Oakland Traction Company were, therefore, ordered off the rear platform. They would have been ordered off the front platforms also, but it is the policy in Oakland to do as many things by halves as possible, and in this instance the company probably wanted to see what the women would do next. It is probable that a demand would have come for the abatement of the smoke nuisance on the front platforms if the company had not put on cars with smoking compartments, against which it was impossible for the women of Oakland to lodge any complaint. But the women of Oakland are a resourceful bunch and as soon as the "smokers" were put on the women occupied that section of the cars in preference to the section set apart for women. Now the smoking cars on the Oakland lines are filled with women who take all the seats, compelling the men who smoke to hang to the straps or go upon the front platform. It is a small matter to complain about, but it illustrates the somewhat cantankerous disposition of the women that lives in Oakland. It is but just to the Oakland woman, however, to say that perhaps she is no worse in this regard than the women of other cities. Give most women an inch and they will take an ell. And it is a fact well known to philosophers and others since the dawn of history that woman is nothing if she is not fickle.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks: The market has advanced in the past week in various specialties and many of the leading rails and industrials have reached the highest point in two years. The character of the buying has been spectacular in most instances. At no time during the week was there evidence that bankers wished to create much of a public following in the market, all of which speaks strongly for the future betterment in values, and it may be said that influential interests are following the line of the very favorable crop outlook and material industrial improvement which latter factor is developing into a normal state more rapidly than any reported hertofore. As the season progresses and the danger of crop failure is minimized, we should look for the carrying out of comprehensive plans that have been held in abeyance for two years. A restoration of former dividends will occur in many securities and new stocks will be placed on the dividend list. In view of these financial phenomena we may anticipate an invitation for the public to buy and doubtless they will. We are looking for an advancing market for a long time to come, subject to sharp set-backs at intervals from over-speculation.

Wheat: The first week in June was no exception to the general rule of lower prices and with favorable weather for the growing crop professional traders could not resist the selling side of the July Option. Prices at the close of the week showed a decline of about 3 cents per bushel. The deferred futures, September and December, showed a good undertone and these options were supported on any decline and reacted quickly whenever the selling pressure on the July option would show a let up. Cash demand at all primary markets while not urgent has shown very little signs of weakening as receipts have not been enough to supply the immediate wants of the mills, and stocks in store at all points have shown some heavy reductions and are now down to a very low ebb. The foreign news has been very bullish, and reports of damage to the growing crops of Hungary, France and parts of Russia by drought continues, but this has been offset by more favorable news from Argentine and the southern portion of Russia with heavy shipment of wheat from these two countries as well as from India. As long as the weather continues so favorable for maturing of the new wheat in the southwest sentiment will continue bearish and prices will likely sell off a little further, but should rain set in, it would add to an already bullish situation and turn what apparently looks like a bear market into an active strong market, as the short interest in July is large and would find very little wheat for sale at the present discount under the cash article.

Cotton: The past week was given up to liquidation by the holders of July contracts in the New York Market. This movement was not caused by any lack of confidence as to the merits of the bull side of cotton, but was inspired by the fear that the large spot interests who are in control of the New York stock would tender their entire holdings on first notice day for the purpose of forcing the scattered holders of this option to cover, as it is said that large blocks of July contracts are held by speculators who do not want the cotton. It is but fair to state, however, that the long interest is by no means so large as it was three weeks ago and the action of the market leads us to believe that quite a deal of short selling has occurred. The market therefore is technically much stronger and as soon as the July liquidation is thoroughly accomplished, prices could easily be advanced sharply. It is doubtful if values will be allowed to decline much further. Around 10.50 the July contracts should look very attractive to spinners as the New York stock is exceptionally good quality and selling at a discount of about $5 per bale compared with spots at the South. Week end figures were all bullish and showers occurred in the Eastern Belt and Mississippi Valley far too frequently to admit of any progress being made toward cultivation. Much comment is rife just now on account of so many cotton men centering in New York. Some of them are talking in a bullish vein and predicting the most sensational market in history before the summer is over. Among the visitors is John H. McFadden of Philadelphia and Liverpool, who has been watching every move made in the pit for some time. He represents the biggest spot interest in the market. Fergus Reid of Norfolk, Va., one of the biggest and most successful operators in the world was also noticed in consultation with his New York associates. William P. Brown and Frank B. Hayne of New Orleans have lately arrived in New York. The Brown-Hayne combination once before carried over all the cotton that could be brought to New York, and wound up their campaign successfully. With Brown and Hayne is E. G. Scales, a follower of Patten of Chicago, who is said to have more than once made sensational winnings on the bull side of wheat and cotton. Mr. J. N. Carpenter of Natchez, Miss., was another of the big cotton men of the South to arrive the past week. No man in the cotton market has a larger personal following among big operators than Mr. Carpenter. There are many other men of prominence in New York watching the cotton market, and several prominent English operators are reported en route from Liverpool.

Milo

Do you know what Quality means in a Turkish Cigarette? If not get a box of "MILO." Then, any other cigarette, and try same, side by side. You'll note the delicate, aromatic mildness of the "MILO." Mildness (yet with the richness in flavor) is what costs in Turkish Tobacco, and its just this that makes the Perfect Cigarette. You'll find it in No Other.

This perfection is obtained only by owning our own plantation in Turkey—the careful watchfulness from the seeding to the finished article.

Smart Set Salacities

There is much in the news of the day emanating from the inner temple of the high society of this glorious Republic that appeals to lovers of salacity. We are being regaled with narratives of sexual turmoil, with dramas peopled by abnormal but flesh-and-blood characters, in whose spangled careers are mirrored the modes and sentiments of the bagnio, creatures of foul speech and foul manners too degenerate to keep their soiled linen from the public eye. And these creatures whose free-and-easy ways revolt the senses are representatives of the set that is the font and origin of the manners and customs of American society. The Vanderbilts and the Goulds are at it again. This time it is Howard of the Gould tribe who is nauseating us with the story of his domestic infelicities, humiliating the lady who was formerly known as "the waif of the bad lands," and whose romantic rescue from the Indians at the ford of the Big Cheyenne by Colonel Cody, a Government scout, popularly known as Buffalo Bill, served to impart an adventitious interest to her brief career on the stage. This Gould scandal has been occupying public attention for several years but it was not till this week that it reached its pungent efflorescence. It might have been avoided by a noiseless compromise, but the Gould sons have inherited so strong a love of money that the thought of being separated from it is always painful. The only generous members of the family are the daughters—Helen, who is a philanthropist and the bizarre lady who has been supporting Parisian loafers for some years.

The Vanderbilts

Alfred Vanderbilt who is said to have broken the heart of Mme. Ruiz and driven her to self-slaughter, is keeping alive the reputation of the family for licentiousness. The Vanderbilts are a degenerate family. They have been rapidly dissipating the immense fortune that was bequeathed to them and it was but the other day that we learned that they had lost control of the New York Central Railroad which was the exclusive property of the second generation. Alfred Vanderbilt is of the third generation. His father was Cornelius Vanderbilt, and from him he inherited an estate appraised at nearly $20,000,000. He married Miss Elsie French in 1901. The marriage was not approved by the members of his family, but his wife was a popular member of the Newport set. It was only a short time ago that we learned that Willie K. Vanderbilt Jr. who married Birdie Fair had an "affinity." Reggie Vanderbilt was involved in a big gambling scandal in New York, and some years ago the William K. Vanderbilts Sr. figured in a sensational divorce.

A Coincidence Causes Gossip

The change in the summer plans of Mrs. William G. Irwin and her daughter Helene and the sudden departure of a young millionaire for Europe has started gossip going again. Mrs. Irwin and her daughter had intended to spend the summer at Newport with Mrs. Edward Moore Robinson, but they decided to go to Europe instead. They sail next week and almost simultaneously with the announcement came the bulletin of the departure of the young man for at least the same quarter of the globe. His attentions to Miss Helene were marked during the winter, and should he be successful in his suit with her it is not likely that Mrs. Irwin will frown upon it, as she is rumored to have done upon that of others.

The Titled Mills' Twin

A correspondent writes me that D. O. Mills' granddaughter Beatrice, who is now "Lady" Granard has been taken to the bosom of London society. A British journal recently credited her with having acquired the tact and graciousness of a London hostess of long standing. "Of course," writes my correspondent, "it is not to be supposed in England that tact and graciousness are ever to be found in an American woman who had never had experience in English society." Lady Granard recently gave a reception for the Women's National Liberal Association. Among the notable figures was Lady Granard's mother, Mrs. Ogden Mills. Her gown, decidedly French in design, was of very pale blue with loose transparent sleeves of silvery net, while clouds of tulle filled in the low cut bodice, which was most elaborately embroidered in brilliants. For jewels she wore a high diamond collar of scroll pattern, from which fell three huge pear-shaped diamonds the size of a pigeon's egg. Her rope of pearls was quite wonderfully twisted four times round her neck and falling below her waist."

She's So Bright!

My correspondent sent me a clipping from the London Onlooker which is rather interesting: "Even an American countess has her path beset by pitfalls when she tries her 'prentice hand at entertaining the rather unnecessarily critical grand dames of Mayfair, but Lady Granard is so bright and clever, with a charmingly expressive face, and as she has been brought up imbued with the traditions of the princely hospitality of her parents' palatial home, there is not much even our most famous political hostesses can teach her." At Buckingham Palace, on May 21, the King invested the Earl of Granard, Master of the Horse, with the insignia of a Knight of St. Patrick, an honor which his Majesty recently conferred upon him. The Earl was introduced into his Majesty's presence by the Viscount Althorp (Lord Chamberlain), preceded by the Ulster King of Arms (Capt. Nevile R. Wilkinson), bearing the Star, Riband, and Badge and the Athlone Pursuivant of Arms (Mr. G. D. Burtchaell) bearing the Sword. The insignia were handed to His Majesty on a velvet cushion, and the King, who was in uniform, personally invested Lord Granard with them.

Mother Doesn't Know

If the roll of the younger society were called there would be few of the girls likely to answer "No" to the question of whether or not they smoked—that is, if any one besides their mothers were the interrogators. It is amazing to discover how blissfully ignorant the matrons are with the fact familiar to everyone else, that their daughters not only smoke but smoke to excess. At a recent luncheon a mother with a debutante daughter was holding forth on her horror at the mere suggestion that the use of cigarettes was common among the younger girls. "I would be willing to believe a girl capable of any indiscretion, if she were addicted to the cigarette habit," was her decision. Now the amusing part of it is that her own daughter is an inveterate smoker. She is a clever little musician and improvises gloriously for her friends under clouds of cigarette smoke, but it is evident that her mother knows nothing about it, else she would be more guarded in her comments.

To Marry Into the Service

Exclusive Alameda society was furnished with two surprises last week when two of its fairest maids announced their engagements and both to naval officers. At a daintily appointed tea Miss Catherine Do Carmo Searls, eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Searls, told the culmination of a "fleet week" romance, for it was at a navy dinner that she met Ensign George Laird of the U. S. S. Cleveland, now on the Asiatic station. Miss Searls is a petite blonde, extremely vivacious, while Ensign Laird is very tall and dark. The prospective bride is connected with the pioneer aristocracy, her mother having been Miss Mattie Cole, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Cole, an early day mining magnate. Mrs. Cole herself belongs to the Yates family and the Belknaps. It is deeply regretted that Ensign Laird's duties hold him in such a remote station, as the wedding will not take place in California, where the bride is so well known and loved. Early in the fall she will leave for the Orient, where the marriage will take place soon after her arrival, and while the groom's service holds him in Asiatic waters, she will remain there. Miss Ida Elizabeth Pattiani's finance is R. Duncan Gatewood, Constructor at Mare Island. Their wedding will take place in September, and will be a brilliant affair and thereafter their home will be at the Navy Yard, where the bride is already well known through her frequent visits at the home of the groom's parents.

The Spreckels Romance

The news comes to me from Paris that if it should turn out that Claus Spreckels Jr. and Miss Mary Adele Case of Portland are already married it will cause no surprise in the California colony of the French metropolis, the members of which believe that the pretty little romance had made considerable progress before young Spreckels's parents received the first inkling of their son's sentimental affair. And, by the way, Californians in Paris warmly approve the match. They say that Miss Case is a very sweet girl of exceptional talent and that the Spreckels family should be elated at the prospect of her becoming a member thereof. "A little of the artistic temperament is just what the Spreckels's need," said one commentator, "and as Claus Jr. is the first representative of the sugar house to exhibit symptoms of an appreciation of something besides the material things of life he should be encouraged." He is said to be a fine young fellow with a sincere passion for music and a voice that is worth hearing. Miss Case is a young woman of culture, and while in Paris she enjoyed the society of the literary set. She was chaperoned by Mme. Lischer Miller, the writer.

At Pacific Grove

Pacific Grove is coming into high favor again and the indications are that, in point of numbers at least the season will be the most prosperous in years. Many cottages have been taken, the lessees settling down comfortably for a full three months' at the sea side, and the hotels and boarding houses are making reservations every day for those who have engaged quarters to be occupied as soon as the schools close. Building is energetic. James L. Gillis, State Librarian at Sacramento, will begin building this summer on property purchased

Work has just completed a ten-thousand dollar residence at China Point, where the State University Marine Laboratory is to be located, and there are a number of other home in course of construction in the same vicinity on what is known as the University Tract, one of the choicest residence tracts on the bay. The Walter Newloves of Pacific Grove, with the Santa Cruz and Hollister branches of the family, a party of thirteen, left last week in a special car for a tour of the larger cities of the East and Canada. It was part of their plan to visit Yosemite and all the points of interest in Southern California before leaving the State. The Newloves came into great wealth through the discovery of an unlimited flow of oil through a tract of land owned by them in the southern end of King county. Their home in Pacific Grove, formerly owned by the Osbornes, is one of the show places of that district.

An Oakland Vocalist

Miss Mabel Riegelman, an Oakland girl who, on the advice of Mme. Gadski, went to Germany four years ago for a course of voice culture, has returned to her home. On Tuesday evening, June 8, she gave her first concert at the Macdonough Theatre, and demonstrated to a large and fashionable audience not only the artistry of her method but the earnestness of her application. Her tones were sweet and pure, her enunciation perfect and her art so artless as to seem natural. The program was a lengthy one, and the numerous encores testified to the appreciation and musical discrimination of the listeners. An agreeable novelty was the two songs by the young American composer, Frank La Farge. No small share of the success of the concert was due to Mr. Frederick Maurer who has often been called the most artistic and satisfactory accompanist on the Pacific Coast. Before going abroad Miss Riegelman was a pupil of Louis Crepaux of this city, and he was one of the most interested and enthusiastic listeners at this, her first public appearance.

A Club of Southerners

The Southern Club, recently organized by some of the prominent southern residents, threw open its hospitable doors in a formal opening on Friday evening last. The club rooms, which are on the tenth and eleventh floors of the Commercial Building, are furnished in Colonial style, but the cafe is the distinguishing feature for here will be served in true southern style the dishes which are especially associated with the old South. In fact, the club is to be southern in far more than its name, for its object is to draw together those who entertain the old ideals of chivalry and citizenship, and eligibility to membership is restricted to those born in one of the Southern States or the District of Columbia, or whose parents were so born or "any white male person of lawful age who is of Southern affiliation or Southern sympathies as a result of residence in the South." Culture, as well as good fellowship will be encouraged, and gentlemen of artistic, literary and scientific tastes will be brought together. This opening is but the first of a number of similar gatherings which have been projected. The guests were drawn from what is locally known as the Southern Set, and the soft accent predominated. James K. Polk, one of the leading spirits of the club, was chairman of the evening. Chief Justice Beatty was to have made the opening speech, but was called out of town to his own regret and that of the guests. The officers and directors of the club are: D. A. Hodghead, president; J. W. Pinder, vice-president; J. H. Jordan, secretary; J. S. Osborne, treasurer; W. A. Drennan, Wm. P. Hubbard, W. B. Cheatham, J. M. Perkins, H. J. Rogers, directors; Chief Justice Beatty, Judge Walter B. Cope, Dr. W. A. Morton, C. B. Seger, Harry T. Creswell, W. N. Moore, James P. Langhorne, advisatory board.

In the Social Spotlight

Mrs. Bronte Aitkin has returned from Camp Meeker where she was the guest of her sister, Mrs. Ella Ulig. The Aitkins have taken a house on Jackson street.

Mrs. John D. Tallant will arrive from New York about the end of June, after a year's absence. She will be accompanied by her son Jack, a student at Columbia University, who will spend his vacation in California. Miss Elsie Tallant will remain in the east and visit some of the watering places with friends. Mrs. Tallant is the widow of John D. Tallant, the banker, and a daughter of Mrs. and the late Judge Selden S. Wright.

The Marion Leventritts have returned from the East and are sojourning at the Vendome.

Mr. and Mrs. Philip Young are visitjng at Pleasanton, the guests of Mrs. Phoebe Hearst. From there they will go to Carson, Nevada, the childhood home of Mrs. Young, and that visit concluded, will return to this city to spend a little while with Mrs. Young's parents, the D. A. Benders, before leaving for their home in Boston.

Miss Marie Louise Forster of Ross Valley will leave this week for Eagle's Nest, the ranch of Baron and Baroness Von Schroeder, where she will be the guest of Miss Edith Von Schroeder for the next few weeks.

Mr. and Mrs. Harry Holbrook (Lily Spreckels) have taken possession of their newly completed Pacific avenue home.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Fee have taken the Herrin cottage at Shasta for the summer.

Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Palmer entertained Mrs. F. C. Bromwell and daughter Bernice from Oakland at Hotel Rafael this week.

The season at Lake Tahoe is fairly open, and the resort promises to be the scene of much summer activity. The weather for the month of June has been delightfully warm. The trout are unusually large this year, Mr. L. C. Robertson and party of this city bringing in a catch of sixty-five pounds as the result of one morning's sport with the rod. The Los Angeles colony at Tahoe Tavern was augmented by the arrival of Edwin T. Earl and family and Mr. and Mrs. Horace Wilson. R. E. Hanchett and party are also at the Tavern. Mrs. C. Frederick Kohl and her mother, Mrs. Godey, stopped off at Tahoe on their way home from the east and were met by Mr. Kohl. Mr. George Francis and family are making a prolonged stay. Mr. Francis and his two boys, under the guidance of the popular Bob Watson, made an enjoyable trip over the Twin Peaks trail.

Miss Laura Lewis gave a luncheon party to twelve at the Hotel Victoria on Monday, after which bridge was inaugurated in the tea room.

Alfred Roncovieri has returned home for a vacation from the University of Pennsylvania where he is a student in medicine. In two years he will complete the course which he began two years ago.

None of the announcements for the week created such a genuine surprise as that of the engagement of Miss Ethel Edgerton Coope and Mackenzie Gordon, the well known tenor. Miss Coope, who is of English descent, is a charming and cultivated girl, and Mr. Gordon is well known among music lovers. Mr. C. H. Billings, the capitalist, and maternal grandfather of the bride to be, has made her a gift of a handsome residence on Steiner street. The date of the wedding has not yet been announced.

John R. Sievers, the well known florist, announces to the public the opening of the most complete floral display in the city at the new location, northwest corner of O'Farrell and Powell streets. Mr. Sievers makes a specialty of supplying cut flowers, palms, etc., for receptions and banquets.

MURINE EYE REMEDY CO., Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen:—We have a little fellow four months old who was troubled for three months after birth with sore eyes. A large amount of pus came from them, accompanied with severe inflammation. Our family Doctor, also an Eye Specialist, attended him without relief.

I saw your MURINE EYE REMEDY advertised in one of our Electric Cars, and utterly discouraged, I resolved to try it, and do you know, in three days' time all worry was over. In one week the Sore Eyes were a thing of the past.

This is an unasked for testimonial, but I know you will accept it as it is sent with much gratitude toward MURINE EYE REMEDY. Yours truly,

Arthur Snow.

An enjoyable musicale was given by the Misses Rachael and Eva Wolfsohn at the Settlement Club in honor of Charles Turner, the artist who leave for Paris this week to be gone for a year's study. Amongst those who contributed to the pleasure of the evening were Miss Ruth Powers, Miss Mabel Freeman and Miss Rodgers.

Mr. and Mrs. George Loring Cunningham and Miss Enid left the city last Tuesday to spend the summer in Berkeley. Miss Madge will join the family later.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Powers have taken the Hooper Farm at Mountain View and will spend the next six months there. Miss Madeline Powers recently entertained a large house party at the farm, which is one of the show places of the section.

All Marin county is interested in the success of the Song Festival to be given for the benefit of the Hill Farm at the Lagunitas Country Club, Ross Valley, at three o'clock this Saturday afternoon, by the children of the Telegraph Hill Neighborhood Association. The Hill Farm at Bothin, Marin county, is a convalescents' home for women and children, under the patronage of some of our best known social philanthropists. The cause is a worthy one, an it is expected that a large audience will be gathered from bay points, as the sale of tickets, one dollar for adults and seventy-five cents for children, has been large. Amongst the patronesses of the affair are Mrs. Porter Ashe, Mrs. James Coffin, Miss Coppee, Mrs. M. Esberg, Mrs. Edwin E. Griffith, Mrs. John Martin, Mrs. H. M. A. Miller, Mrs. Seward McNear, Mrs. E. Remington, Mrs. George Pinckard, Mrs. George Page, Mrs. Samuel Wormser, Mrs. Henry Bothin (Miss Chabot).

San Franciscans who are at Pacific Grove Hotel are Mrs. N. J. Dyer and J. Wyper and family, who will remain over June and into July, and the Misses Small, who will spend the season there.

Mr. and Mrs. William Tevis and family, accompanied by Mrs. William McKittrick of Bakersfield, are at the Fairmont for a few days.

Among the prominent people from the southern part of the State now at the Fairmont are Mrs. A. C. Orena, Mrs. E. P. Chamberlain, Mrs. Clinton B. Hale and Miss Edwards, Santa Barbara.

Miss Ida Wickson was the guest of honor at a delightful luncheon given by Mrs. Henry Meyer of Menlo Park in the gray room of the Fairmont on Tuesday afternoon. Covers were laid for twenty-one and the tables were adorned with immense bowls of lilies of the valley and maidenhair. The gowns, which were remarkably handsome, were set off by the color scheme and decorations. After luncheon, coffee was served in the Laurel Court, in the pleasing fashion so much in vogue.

The weekly luncheons of the California Promotion Committee held on Fridays in the Red Room of the Fairmont, are among the most popular affairs given under the auspices of that organization. For the past few weeks the committee has been entertaining parties of representative citizens from other parts of the State, the Sacramento businessmen, the North of Bay Counties Committee, and last week the San Jose Chamber of Commerce. These meetings fostering as they do the get-together spirit which has been so much needed in California, are productive of incalculable good.

Mr. and Mrs. L. R. Mead entertained a house party this week in their cottage at Byron Hot Springs in honor of Miss Peggy Simpson who has just announced her engagement to Lieutenant Harold Naylor, U. S. A. Among the other guests were Colonel Wm. A. Simpson, Miss Innes Keeney and Lieutenant J. Burns, U. S. A.

PRICE OF COAL SLASHED

As the just result of a war that has broken out among the wholesale coal dealers of this city the Pacific Coast Coal Company have decided to reduce the price of "genuine Richmond coal" to the retailer from $9 a ton to $7.50 a ton. It is expected that there will be a corresponding cut in the price to the consumer. If the price was $10.50 before it should now be no more than $9. The consumer should have his winter's fuel delivered at the same price his dealer formerly paid.

Nobody can predict now to what extent this cut in price will go, for the opening gun in any war is perhaps only the beginning of a general conflict. The reduction in price has already gone into effect and all the retailers of the city have received a circular letter from the Pacific Coast Coal Company, Merchants' Exchange Building, which is the sole distributor of the coal it handles, announcing the new price. Every coal that is handled probably will get a cut from the new price.

The battle took definite form when the Pacific Coast Coal Company discovered that J. J. Moore & Co. were handling an Australian coal at $8 a ton. N. Poston, the head of the Pacific Coast Coal Company, went to Seattle on a mysterious errand when this became known, and on his return put Richmond coal on the market at $7.50 the ton. Mr. Poston says: "The reduction to the retailers has began. We have made this cut for the purpose of stimulating trade. We are overstocked. I presume the other dealers will have to meet our price, but I would hardly call it a coal war."

The new price probably will be in effect till far into the fall, and it is declared it will stand during the winter. The Western Fuel Company is one of the big competitors of the Pacific Coast Coal Company, and it remains to be seen what part in the coming contest this corporation and the other large wholesalers of the city will take. At any rate a sharp conflict is threatened and one which can work no harm to the consumer.

In addition to the announcement of the cut in price comes the information from an authoritative source that there is no danger of a coal famine here this winter as was the case last year. This is due to the large amount of coal the dealers have on hand, the number of tons in ships now on their way to this port and the unusual output in Australia. The more the cheaper, and it is probable that the new schedule of prices will be in effect for some time.

The Grand Opera Season

True to local tradition the International Grand Opera Company opened a season of Italian opera at the Princess Theatre last Monday night in "Aida." I have been told that a superstition is responsible for the inevitableness of "Aida" on opening night, but I am incredulous. I know that theatre managers are superstitious, but what concerns them principally at the opening of a season is the prospect from a pecuniary standpoint, and I am sure that an "Aida" opening does not insure a successful season. Frosts have followed "Aida." I am sure also that there is nothing of significance from an artistic standpoint in an "Aida" opening. Verdi is not at his best in "Aida." There is very little of the melody expressive of human feeling in this opera. On the contrary there is much that is superficial and trivial. Again, though Verdi was a master in the art of displaying the human voice, the highest expression of his genius in that line is not to be found in "Aida." It is not the best Italian opera for introductory purposes, so why not break away from tradition? All this is not by way of finding fault with the opening of the season at the Princess. Indeed I have no fault to find with that opening. Artistically it was all that one should have desired. There was nothing sensational about it, but for that very reason it was all the more gratifying. There was a sincerity about it that compelled approval. It was apparent that the principle of co-operation is the guiding principle of this company and that the aim is to give complete and evenly balanced performances. This was the character of the performance given Monday night, nobody monopolizing the honors, full justice being done to each role. Bertossi was given the most cordial greeting, and she played Aida with fine taste and spirit, but in this role her lyric voice is not heard to the best advantage. She has some magnificent tones but in Aida there is too much of dramatic intensity for her. She never sets you a-quiver. She merely floats on the surface of a river of pure sound. Miss Georgina Strauss of Philadelphia, and not even via Paris or Berlin made a very favorable impression as Amneris. She has a sweet voice and what she does is apparently with easy mastery. Bari, the tenor, ingratiated himself with the audience by his easy rendition of his role unaccompanied by any striving for sensational effects. The orchestra was well handled by Conductor Merola, a musician of considerable magnetism. Some interesting musical history will be made by the International Company during the next few weeks. It is unquestionably capable of high artistic achievement and certain it is that it contains much vocal ability. In short it is a strong organization better equipped in all the essential elements than more than one company remembered with pleasure by our lovers of Italian opera.

"Salvation Nell"

Edward Sheldon's "Salvation Nell" now at the Valencia is realistic to the last degree. It is a drama of human nature in the rough, the everlasting warfare between right and wrong waged in the atmosphere of the slum. Sheldon's play has atmosphere and plenty of it. Nothing could be more vivid, more genuine than the setting of its three strong simple acts. It opens in Sid McGovern's bar, decorated for Christmas Eve. Into this low resort come stragglers of all kinds, men and women, young and old, roughs and derelicts. The roughest and toughest is Jim Platt whose "goil" Nell Saunders is scrub woman in the place. For Jim like many of his sort is not above living on the wages of the woman whose lover he is. Standing in the doorway of the family cafe Nell watches Jim spend her hard earned dollars with the air of a lord. She is on the downward path, but is stolid and patient over it. Her appeals to Jim have no effect, yet when another frequenter of the bar room casts a favorable eye on her he is ready with his fists and nearly kills his man. The police are called in, the ambulance arrives, nurses and doctors see to the wounded man and carry him off on a stretcher. Jim is arrested and led off to jail by the officers. In the meantime a raid has been made on a disorderly house in the neighborhood, and one of the inmates, Myrtle Odell, seeks safety in the saloon until the trouble blows over. Jaunty, insouciant and overdressed she has a feeling of human pity for Nell, and thinks to assist her out of her misery by bringing her into the kind of life she is herself leading. Here comes the first act in the soul-drama. Maggie, the lieutenant of the Salvation army enters the fight for Nell's soul, the forces of good triumph, and Nell goes out through the saloon doors to join the passing Salvation army. Eight years pass before the opening of the next act. In her little flat with her boy and sure of herself, Nell fears no evil until she hears that Jim's time is up and that he is seeking her. Then the conflict begins anew. Back from his eight years of prison life, pallid, broken yet hardened Jim reappears. He realizes that things have changed, yet sees no reason why he should not resume his old sway over the woman who was once his. Nell has an instinct that any weak relenting on her part would drag her down into the depths from which she has emerged, and not withstanding her pity and even her old infatuation for the father of her boy she holds out against his advances. The last act is a realistic presentation of a squalid tenement row, tall houses, windows crowded with faces, the streets full of children, all the life and movement of the slum. Jim has followed Nell to the entrance of the Salvation barracks and here is played the last act of the drama, the conquest of Jim Platt. Jim enters the path already taken by Salvation Nell, and becomes a convert. All this sounds very preachy and much like an old-fashioned tract, but on the contrary is very natural and human. Its fidelity to life is always fascinating and at times even frightful. You feel that the conflict between right and wrong, between the forces that raise man and those that sink him to perdition is no trifling thing as it is waged here before your eyes. The second act is the strongest, and it belongs to Holbrook Blinn. He has changed from the brutal careless loafer of the first act to the man with a grudge against society, ready to begin a new career of crime because it will not accept his redress of eight prison years. Furtive and ashamed he creeps into Nell's flat, his old passion flaming up by starts, his awkward awakening to parenthood, his jealousy of Major Williams are wonderfully depicted by Mr. Blinn. The star has lost none of the technique which is always present in her acting. She has the same quiet ways and subdued staccato voice, more distinct than of old. Pathos is the dominant quality of her Nell. Her support is magnificent. Every character is a study and each one is done to the life. Myrtle Odell of the mincing step and the strident laugh, grenadier-like Hallelujah

SCENE FROM JOSEPH HART'S "FUTURITY WINNER"

Maggie, the slum women, the patrons of McGovern's, and even the children of the Cherry street tenements are polished and perfect. It is doubtful if without the wonderful acting of Mrs. Fiske and Mr. Blinn and the perfect realism of the scenery and minor characters, "Salvation Nell" would seem the same thing. The drama is not so much one of incident as of the play of hidden forces deep in the heart of humanity. In the hands of less accomplished players its outward manifestations could easily be overdone, and it would then degenerate into the crudest of melodramas.

"Du Barry" at the Alcazar

Florence Roberts as Du Barry is drawing full houses to the Alcazar this week, notwithstanding the unusual number of attractions at other places of amusement. The role of the frail Jeanne Vaubernier has been so identified with Mrs. Leslie Carter that comparison is at once challenged. It has not lost in Roberts's hands, but has in many respects gained. We miss the raucous voice and the strong—not to say rank—acting of Mrs. Carter. Miss Roberts has a musical voice and a pleasing personality, and has invested the character with some appealing qualities. The Belasco drama departs widely from history in its incidents. "The doll of France" was not such a hysterical fool as he has represented her to be. Be it remembered, she kept her hold on Louis until his death by small-pox in 1774 when she was banished from Versailles by his successor. Her influence over the old King was absolute, and the fall of the Due de Choiseul speaks for her political power. However, as Mr. Belasco has given us a stage Du Barry with all the clap-trap of the Cosse incident we must take her as she is. And she is in every respect meretricious; from the first scene in the milliner shop to the last in the tumbril she is the courtesan, extravagant in her whims, rude in her speech, canaille in her manners and cowardly in her soul. She has one or two spasms of better feeling which, according to all accounts, never troubled the real Du Barry, but throughout the play her one appeal to sympathy is the sentimental love she bears to Cosse. Miss Roberts made the most of her character, which is done in poster effect from first to last. There is no opportunity and there is no need for fineness or delicacy of touch; the broad brush, the vivid splash of color is what is required. As a stage production Du Barry is sumptuous. It has color, light, motion, all that appeals to the eye and stirs the imagination through the senses. Too much cannot be said of the magnificence of the Alcazar's staging. It is fully equal to any of the high-priced productions brought from the east, and charged for accordingly. Miss Roberts is well supported by Thurlow Bergen and the Alcazar stock company. The five acts and nine scenes of the play together with its long list of characters and supernumeraries do not appear to be a tax on the resources of the local house. Where all the characters are so well taken, it is almost impossible to particularize, but a word of praise should be awarded to Mr. Bennison who played the ungrateful role of Louis XV with dignity. There is such a sacrifice of Kinghood in the lines and situations that the actor who can make this role neither foolish nor unconvincing has achieved a great deal. The star was the recipient of numerous curtain calls, and at the close of the second act flowers enough to stock a green house were passed over the footlights. An insistant audience demanded a speech, when Miss Roberts generously ascribed the success of the play to her associates, the members of the Alcazar company.

"The Morals of Marcus"

Charles Frohman will present Miss Marie Doro in "The Morals of Marcus" at the Van Ness Theatre on Monday, June 21st. In this play, we are told, there is delightful fantasy and rare delicacy of sentiment, projected in sparkling and truly epigramatic dialogue. The theme is largely that of sober, middle aged bachelordom unconditionally capitulating before the charming irresponsibility of carefree eighteen.

Orpheum Vaudeville

That the Orpheum is highly successful in its quest after novelties will be strikingly evidenced next week when Joseph Hart's "Futurity Winner," in many respects the most remarkable offering in vaudeville, will be presented. It is a one-act drama in two scenes by Edmund Day. The first takes places in the jockey's headquarters at Sheepshead Bay Race Tract, just prior to the big racing event "The Futurity." The second is "in the stretch" on the track itself, showing an actual race between three thoroughbred horses. While the plot is carried through within twenty minutes, the story

A DAINTY TOILET ARTICLE

Every lady who desires to keep up her attractive appearance, while at the rheatre, attending teceptions, when shopping, while travelling and on all occasions should carry in her purse a booklet of Gouraud's Oriental Beauty Leaves. This is a dainty little booklet of exquisitely perfumed powdered leaves which are easily removed and applied to the skin. It is invaluable when the face becomes moist and flushed and is far superior to a powder puff as it does not spill and soil the clothes. It removes dirt, soot and grease from the face, imparting a cool delicate bloom to the complexion. Sent anywhere on receive of Five Cents in stamps or coin. F. T. Hopkins, 37 Great Jones street, New York.

is completely and interestingly told. "Futurity Winner" was presented this season in England, Germany, France and America. James Thornton, one of the greatest vaudeville favorites that has ever appeared in this city will renew his acquaintance with the Orpheum patrons next week and is sure of a cordial reception. Mr. Thornton is a song writer, the author of "When You Were Sweet Sixteen," "She May Have Seen Better Days" and other old time favorites. He is also a witty entertainer and never fails to amuse his audiences. The Camille Trio, comic horizontal bar performers, will also be included in the coming bill. They are not only marvelous gymnasts but also original and amusing comedians who have made a great hit in the East. Gladys Clarke and Henry Bergman will present a sketch called "The Chauffeur and the Maid." It consists of comedy dialogue and some lively singing and dancing numbers. Next week will be the last of Elizabeth Murray, Warren Lyon and Meyers and of Adelaide and her dancing four. The finale to the program will be a series of Orpheum Motion Pictures of extraordinary merit and interest on "A Day of Perkin."

Another Week of "Du Barry"

It is not surprising that a second week of "Du Barry" is announced by the Alcazar management, for only complimentary things have been said or written by those who have witnessed this splendid production of David Belasco's historical play. No previous enterprise of the Alcazar management could be compared to this one in point of artistic acting, ela borate staging and pecuniary cost, and no other stock theatre on earth could so thoroughly fill those requirements. Indeed "Du Barry" is likely to remain the Alcazar's greatest achievement.

Two Weeks of Mrs. Fiske

Mrs. Fiske, with the Manhattan Company, will enter upon the second and final week of her engagement in "Salvation Nell" at the Valencia Theatre on Monday night. Not in years has San Francisco been so stirred by a play as by this colossal drama of the slums. The management of the theatre desired an extension of the engagement owing to the capacity business which has prevailed since Mrs. Fiske's opening, but this was found impossible, on account of her previous bookings on the coast. Thus all San Franciscans who desire to see Mrs. Fiske in her latest and one of her greatest triumphs will have to visit the Valencia during the coming week.

"Girl of the Golden West" at the Liberty

Next Monday evening Oakland theatregoers will be given their first opportunity of seeing David Belasco's greatest triumph, "The Girl of the Golden West," which is to be given by the re-organized Bishop Players at the Liberty Playhouse next week. This play promises to be the most popular ever offered by the trans-bay stock company, for, even though it has never been offered there before it would be difficult indeed to find anyone who has not heard or read of it, and as a result interest in its forthcoming presentation is widespread. The Liberty management are preparing to make the production a notable one, both from a scenic and an acting standpoint. Miss Florence Oakley and Sydney Ayres, the new leading people who open their season in the leading roles of the drama, have both appeared in it before, Miss Oakley with the Belasco Company in Los Angeles, and Mr. Ayres in the memorable Portland run of the piece, so with the benefit of this former experience almost perfect performances of the roles can be expected from them. Robert

MRS. FISKE AND HOLBROOK BLINN

In the third act of "Salvation Nell," which is creating such a sensation at the Valencia Theatre.

Harrison is splendidly equipped to carry the difficult part of the sheriff to a successful issue, and every one of the remaining characters will be interpreted by a player of experience and ability. And the scenery will be wonderfully realistic. The enormous revolving stage with which the Liberty is fitted permits of the play being staged as it could no where else, and some wonderful effects can be secured. If "The Girl of the Golden West" fails to run longer than one week at the Liberty a great many prophesies will fail, especially as the Special Summer Prices prevail, the entire lower floor being fifty cents and the balcony twenty-five cents at all performances.

The Opera Season

The grand opera season at the Princess is proving a brilliant success and at every performance during the week the theatre has been crowded to its capacity and the greatest enthusiasm has been manifested. This Saturday matinee "Fedora" will be repeated with Madame Therry in the title role and this Saturday evening "Aida" will be given with Madame Bertossi in the name part. Tomorrow, Sunday night, the program will be "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "I'Pagliacci." The repertoire for next week will be Monday and Saturday evenings and Wednesday matinee, "Lucia" with Norelli, Bari, Arcangeli, Oteri; Tuesday evening and Saturday matinee, "Il Trovatore" with Bertossi, Bari, Zara and Gravina; Wednesday and Sunday evenings, "Carmen" with Merola, Colombini, Zara, Oteri; Thursday, "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "I'Pagliacci, and Friday evening, "Fedora."

"The Blue Mouse"

"The Blue Mouse" playing to capacity houses in its first week at the American Theatre and with the advance sale giving every indication of duplicating the success of the opening the much discussed and reported salacious Fitch farce will probably run indefinitely in this city. However disappointing it may be to the puritanical the fact is that "The Blue Mouse" with a sensational record behind it and a packed expectant audience in front of it, is a harmless moral play as well as a brilliant one. Prudishness, after all is but one of the sensations of prurience. Anyone who discovers real evil in "The Blue Mouse" is unconsciously betraying his own tainted pointed of view. The comedy is such a bold, frank farce that it leaves no room for any other interpretation than a humorous one. If the situations it handles were treated in the spirit of a problem play, the result might be different. But they are not. They are treated as jokes. And no incident of life can be vulgar if we look upon it as being very ridiculous or very serious. So much for the censorship that has been hovering along the trail of this comedy. The remarkable thing is that "The Blue Mouse" has lived down one reputation and achieved another, even more difficult to maintain and more appealing. Any show can be naughty and interesting. But it takes a good show to be interesting and not naughty."The Blue Mouse" is a series of side splitting situations and complications that involve a gay old boy of a railroad president, his secretary, who is seeking promotion, the innocent young wife and, above all, a roguish little chorus girl, who ties the knots of each complication into a tighter and tighter tangle. It would be impossible to outline the plot clearly as it would be to trace the path of the wind on a breezy morning. Surprises follow each other so rapidly that you can never guess what is to happen next, and each surprise grows more irresistibly funny than the preceding one. Miss Ryan does the character of "The Blue Mouse" charmingly and effectively. Her personality and appearance are in her favor to begin with and to these she adds an incisive understanding of the role.

In the Limelight

Marie Wainwright who appears in support of Marie Doro was last seen here as a star at the head of her own company. She has always been a decided favorite with local theatregoers and her appearance in the cast of "The Morals of Marcus" should tend to give it much strength. Another star player in the cast is Edwin Arden.

It is now only two weeks hence that "The Merry Widow" will make her bow to a San Francisco audience. The Van Ness Theatre management has a vast number of telegraphic, telephone and mail orders on hand already although the advance sale of seats does not open until July 1st.

Juvenile Prattle

A bright American youngster's description of the dachshund: "One of those dogs that is a dog and a half long and only half a dog high."

Little Nina went to church with her grandmother, and for the first time put two pennies in the contribution plate. Leaning over, she whispered very audibly: "That's all right, grandma. I paid for two!"

A little boy of seven, with a very inquiring mind, was persistently asking where God was and how He looked. One clear day he was looking out the window, when, suddenly turning around, he exclaimed: "Auntie, I know where God is!" "Where?" asked the aunt. "Why, in the sun," replied the boy, "'cause when I look at the sun I can't see His face."

Speaking of kindergartens for colored children calls to minds the experience of a matron who was teaching one of the little colored girls on her plantation how to spell. She used a pictorial primer, and over each word was its accompanying picture. Polly glibly spelled "o-x, ox," and "b-o-x, box," etc. But the teacher thought that she was making "right rapid progress." So she put her hand over the picture, and said, "Polly, what does 'o-x' spell?" "Ox," answered Polly, nimbly. "How do you know that it spells 'ox,' Polly?" "Seed his tail," replied the apt Polly.

A little girl, upon being told by her father that he would take her for a drive if her hands were clean, ran up stairs and called excitedly to her older cousin: "Hurry up, Dete; wash my hands quick, just wash the outsides, the insides won't show."

Ike is a veritable pickaninny who flings the King's English around in true negro style, much to his mistress' amusement. One day she observed that his two very prominent front teeth had disappeared, and quizzically asked: "Ike, what has become of your teeth?" "Dey drapped out," promptly replied Ike. "What!" exclaimed his mistress, as if horrified. Ike was baffled, but only for a moment, when he announced with an air of triumph at having corrected himself, "Dey dripped out!"

convinced of the fact that the position of a dead composer was much easier than that of a living one—the dead composer finding a ready publisher for his works and eager managers to produce them—and thus he achieves a success that living composers can dream of tasting only after their death. I am in a position to assert this!

"And now let me tell you the rest of my story: I had a nephew who was absolutely without morals, and I determined to press him into service. Carefully disguised and with precautions of secrecy of which you can have no idea, I hunted him up, this conscienceless young man, and made him a proposition. After much deliberation we arrived at an agreement that my death was to be declared a suicide; the evidences were to be found in the letter that I had supposedly written my nephew on the evening before my death. In the letter I named him as my sole heir. Other documents that gradually came to life confirmed this disposal of my property. At the point on the coast where I was supposed to have been wrecked my nephew found some of my belongings that the sea had thrown back, and among them was my portfolio containing valuable manuscripts.

"As my sole heir he was entitled to all the royalties of my works, and we agreed that he was to pay over to me three-fourths of the sums thus collected. Furthermore, I had named him as the heir to all my unpublished manuscripts and had stated that he was to publish them at his discretion. In this way it has become possible for me since my death to have written six operas, and I hope to write more. I wish to make the whole world gasp in amazement. I wish to make the universe marvel at the tremendous number of operas I had written before the breath of life departed from me! To this end I work with a fiery energy—I am a corpse of most remarkable zeal.

"Since I have died I have allowed myself extravagances that were denied me during life. I own plantations in India, a palace in Rio and a harem in Damascus. All these fancies cost money, and I have to work hard; yet I am convinced that never before has a corpse enjoyed life so vividly.

"But alas! that all this happiness should be marred by a speck of discontent! Each of us carries his own unhappiness in himself, and my misfortune is that I love Paris so dearly, that I adore the city which I cannot see again without risking resurrection. And that is my continued nostalgia. Oh, Paris! One cannot find you in Rio, nor in India, nor in Damascus—not even in Paradise! Apropos, do you happen to know the petite Evelinette, of the Theatre des Varietes?"

"I should say I do!"

"How strange! And you see her occasionally?"

"Very frequently—she is quite my most intimate friend."

"Really?"

"Most assuredly!"

"What a coincidence! Has she ever spoken to you about me?"

"Never!"

He suddenly grew thoughtful; then, after a short silence, he remarked: "You see, there are some disadvantages in being dead. That little toad, little Evelinette, was my last love, my only one. And yet she has succeeded in forgetting me entirely!"

Auto Notes

Banker John Craig of Woodland, with his family, left his home Saturday night for a trip to the Yosemite Valley. From the Park, the party will motor to Lake Tahoe. Both Mr. and Mrs. Craig are enthusiastic motorists and make an annual tour of four to five weeks in their car, Mrs. Craig taking her turn at the wheel. On this trip they will use their Chalmers-Detroit "40."

Like all San Francisco motorists, I. Willard Beam, who recently joined the ranks of autoists by purchasing a Studebaker runabout, says that so far as he can see the roads and streets of San Francisco are very poor in general. Veteran motorists of this city say there is real humor with a touch fo sarcasm concealed in Beam's remarks.

A most remarkable and unprecedented sale of automobiles is revealed by an investigation of the books of the Howard Automobile Company, distributors for California of Buick automobiles, establishing a record for popularity of which every one concerned may feel justly proud. For the three months ending May 31st, 309 Buick automobiles were actually delivered. By an unusual coincidence, the months of March and April produced precisely the same number of deliveries, 99 each, and during the month of May, 111 automobiles were delivered.

After having toured the Santa Clara and San Joaquin valleys continuously since March 13th last, J. P. Gillespie of Palo Alto has scored a mileage of nearly 2,000 miles in his Studebaker car without a single expenditure on repairs or trouble of any kind. Roads of all descriptions, says Gillespie, have been mastered by his car. "The only thing I have done to the car," says Gillespie, "is to clean the plugs once."

Mr. Mathewson is just in receipt of advise from his factory that Diamond Tires had still further success by winning the New Jersey endurance test on May 27th, five of the six cars equipped with Diamond Tires having finished with perfect scores.

Jack Glazer, one of the energetic young business men of Sacramento, has just taken delivery of a new type Chalmers-Detroit "30" Roadster, on which he has placed a small box for the purpose of attaching scales. He may be seen daily going up and down the valley with two Toledo scales fastened to the back of his car.

Mr. R. E. Reid of San Francisco, who purchased an '09 40 horsepower Buick touring car from the Howard Automobile Company in March, and who has spent most of the time since in touring over the State, returned home Friday evening after a four weeks' trip through the southland with Mrs. Reid and Mr. Rice of Tustin, in which they covered over 1800 miles, going through San Diego and into Mexico and back around "The Kite."

Word has been received from the New York branch of the E. R. Thomas Motor Co. that Miss Blanche Bates has taken delivery of her six-cylinder 70 horsepower car. This is the machine which Miss Bates will use on her transcontinental tour. She leaves New York shortly for San Francisco.

In the Auburn, New York, hill climb on Decoration Day the Buick "White Streak" won in its class and made better time than eleven (11) big cars selling from $2000.00 to $4000.00, making the climb of four-tenths of a mile in the fast time of 23½ seconds. The 40 horsepower Buick roadster also won the $200.00 class, making the climb in 21¼ seconds.

Autoists planning a trip through Tehama county from now on will find some splendid strips of roads in the vicinity of Red Bluff, according to Gorman K. King of the latter city who has recently done considerable touring in that portion of the State in his Studebaker car. According to King, several miles of the county roads leading out of Red Bluff has been thoroughly oiled by one of the supervisors of that county and the result has been such that it is only a question of time until the wretched road conditions which have kept out autoists heretofore will be a thing of the past.

Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Morehouse with their son and a chauffeur, passed through San Francisco this week on their way from Los Angeles to Seattle. This is the third trip the party have made from Los Angeles to the northwest in their Thomas Flyer. On the former occasions, however, they drove only as far as Portland. The car is equipped with full camping, fishing and hunting outfit and it is expected the trip will be an ideal one.

The Howard Automobile Company has just been advised by the Buick factory that on June 1st at Bridgeport, Conn., hill climb the Buick "White Streak," driven by Burman, won in its class, defeating all cars selling at $2000.00 and under and many much higher-priced machines, making the climb in one minute and 30 seconds. The Buick 40 horsepower touring car also won in its class with Burman driving, making the climb in 1 minute and 20 1-5 seconds, defeating all touring cars at $5000.00 and under. Another Buick 40 horsepower driven by Hammond got second in this event.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 22419, Dept. No. 10.

HILDA M. WILSON, Plaintiff,
vs.
FRANK J. WILSON, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to Frank J. Wilson, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion of plaintiff; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 14th day of April, A. D. 1909. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

(Seal) By W. R. CASTAGNETTO, Deputy Clerk.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City of and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to Benjamin A. Bertrand, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion of said plaintiff; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 11th day of May, A. D. 1909. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk
(Seal) By L. J. WELCH, Deputy Clerk.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY ORDER OF SALE OF REAL AND PERSONAL ESTATE AT PRIVATE SALE SHOULD NOT BE GRANTED

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 6670, Dept. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of JOHN DEMARTINI, Deceased.

FLORA DEMARTINI, as Administratrix of the estate of John Demartini, deceased, having presented to this Court her verified petition for sale of all the real and personal property of which said decedent died seized and possessed, as far as known to your petitioner, which property is situated in the County of Tulare, State of California, and which is fully described in the petition of said administratrix, to which reference is made;

And it appearing therefrom that it is necessary to sell the whole thereof in order to pay the debts against the estate and costs of administration;

It is ordered that said petition be filed, and all persons interested in the estate of said John Demartini, deceased are directed to appear before the Court on the 20th day of July, 1909, at 10 o'clock a. m. of said last named date, at the courtroom of said Court, Grant Building, Southeast corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be granted to said administratrix to sell at private sale all of said real estate and the personal property belonging to the estate of said John Demartini, deceased, as prayed for in said petition; and it is further ordered that a copy of this order be published four (4) successive weeks in the "Town Talk," a newspaper printed and published in the said City and County of San Francisco.

Done in open Court this 10th day of June, 1909.
THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge.

Endorsed: Filed June 11, 1909. H. I. Mulcrevy, Clerk, by H. G. Benedict, Deputy Clerk.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY SALE OF REAL PROPERTY SHOULD NOT BE MADE.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 4870 N. S. Dept. 10, Probate.

In the Matter of the Estate of DAVID W. FRAZER, Deceased.

JOSEPH A. STULZ, Administrator of the estate of DAVID W. FRAZER, deceased, having presented his petition herein, duly verified, praying for an order of the sale of the whole of the real estate of the said deceased, or so much or such parts thereof as said Court shall judge necessary or beneficial for the reasons and purposes in petition mentioned and set forth.

And such petition having been filed, it is now ordered by said Court that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased be, and they are hereby directed to appear before said Court on Tuesday, the 22nd day of June, 1909, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the courtroom of Department 10 of said Superior Court in the Grant Building, on the southeast corner of Market and Seventh Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, to show cause, if any they have, why an order should not be granted to said Administrator to sell the whole or so much of the real estate of said decedent as may be necessary.

It is further ordered that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for four successive weeks in Town Talk, a newspaper printed and published in the said City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Dated, San Francisco, this 19th day of May, A. D. 1909.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco State of California—No. 16627.

ROBERT HECTOR, Jr., Plaintiff,
vs.
All Persons Claiming Any Interest in or Lien Upon the Real Property Herein Described, or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California, to all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Robert Hector, Jr., plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest, or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly described as follows, to wit:

Lot number 210 as laid down, delineated and designated on a certain map on file in the office of the recorder of the said City and County of San Francisco, known as "Holiday Map A." Said map was filed in the office of the recorder of the City and County of San Francisco on the 1st day of May 1863.

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to wit, that it be adjudged that plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute, that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, or whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description, and that plaintiff recover costs herein, and have such other and further relief as may seem meet and proper in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 4th day of June, 1909.
(Seal) H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

CYNICAL SAYINGS OF DISRAELI

Coquettes give their blossoms to their lovers and their thorns to their husbands.

When a woman has lost one battle she rarely wins another against the same foe.

A blush often announces the departure as well as the arrival of shame.

Why do the Germans make the moon masculine? Surely we are justified in regarding her as feminine, since she is essentially changeable.

Men are people who make rules; women are people who make exceptions.

It is recorded that God said: "Let us make man in our own image, after our own likeness." It would perhaps have been impolite of Moses to hint more directly that woman was made in a very different mould. The conclusion, however, is obvious.

There is no marriage in heaven; neither is there any heaven in marriage.

A beauty without wit seems to me to resemble a bait without any hook in it.

I believe there are some women who wear petticoats simply lest they should be mistaken for men.

There is this difference between passion and love—the one breeds headaches, the other breeds heartaches; but neither would be dangerous if there were no fools in the world.

Love certainly increases the population of the world, but I doubt whether it adds much to that of heaven.

Of all the women whom I have known I chiefly remember those who forgot themselves.

It is quite passible for a man to respect a woman so much that she will despise him.

MARIAN

She can be as wise as we,
  And wiser when she wishes;
She can knit with cunning wit,
  And dress the homely dishes.
She can flourish staff or pen,
  And deal a wound that lingers;
She can talk the talk of men,
  And touch with thrilling fingers.

Match her ye across the sea,
  Natures fond and fiery;
Ye who zest the turtle's nest
  With the eagle's eyrie.
Soft and loving in her soul,
  Swift and lofty soaring;
Mixing with its dove-like dole
  Passionate adoring.

Such as she who'll match with me?
  In flying or pursuing,
Subtle wiles are in her smiles
  To set the world a-wooing.
She is steadfast as a star,
  And yet the maddest maiden;
She can wage a gallant war,
  And give the peace of Eden.

The Interminable Farce

It is perhaps needless at this time to comment on the shortsightedness that led to the fiasco which recently occurred in the presence of that ingenuous personage Judge William P. Lawlor. During the present interlude we respectfully rise to the surface and look around. Of course we find Mr. Heney vociferating as passionately as ever, pouring out his torrent of words, uttering the threats that never fructify in achievement, and reminding the galleries of his pasteboard martyrdom. Inveterately the people's champion, his lungs are the lungs of the steam siren and they are at the disposal of Mr. Spreckels while the leg holds out to be pulled. Once more we catch the sibilant sound of the Phelan voice as the smuggest of all moralists through the reeking columns of his longest leased journal exhorts the dear people not to be diverted from their exalted purpose. Again we hear the doleful lamentations of the hired newspaper organs, and we realize that we are still in the midst of the miserable farce that has been distracting the community for more than two years. Apparently there is no prospect of improvement or amendment. There is a certain pathos if not tragedy in the knowledge that we have wasted thousands of dollars merely to gratify the vindictiveness of a brace of multimillionaires, but not to the point of revolt have we been shocked and outraged by the methods of the infamous Graft Prosecution. We are a patient people. Our forbearance is divine. We tolerated Schmitz and Ruef for nearly six years. It is impossible to predict and even hopeless to guess to what proportions the current incubus will be permitted to grow before a halt is called.

Their Change of Front

That things are not quite so bad as they were in the days when the terrorists were more firmly seated in the saddle we must admit. No threats were made to indict the recalcitrant jurors who were not impressed by Mr. Heney's windy generalities. An emergency session of the grand jury was not held for the purpose of frightening lawyers and witnesses. No loud proclamations were made by the League of Justice. Mr. Spreckels and his henchmen were subdued of manner at the close, and the general tone of their utterances was that of sorrow and poignant disappointment. There has been no abatement of the virulence and malignity of our civic patriots, but they are a little less despotic, a little less autocratic than formerly. They seem to realize that even the purblind man in the street has been able to form a pretty accurate conception of the character of the treatment which Patrick Calhoun received at the hands of the special prosecutor with the sanction of a complaisant judge. It has probably dawned on their perceptions that venom has overshot the mark. They have learned from the jurors that men of instincts not wholly debased are not to be impressed favorably by testimony purchased with immunity or by the oaths of unmoral rascals of the Helms and Korngold type. In the past the sacrosanct ones industriously propagated the notion that it was only by corrupting jurors that the higher-ups could hope to escape, but it is probable they now realize that they will be laughed at if they indulge further in this method of inflaming public sentiment. For it now appears that nothing can be more beneficial to Patrick Calhoun than an absolutely fair trial, and by this time even the man in the street must be sensible of the fact that a trial before an impartial judge and an honest and unbiased jury is what the prosecution has resolved that Patrick Calhoun shall not have. Whether the man in the street is able to apprehend the importance to Mr. Heney of his election to the office of district attorney is a matter upon which it would be vain to speculate. Our own judgment is that the instinct of self-preservation prompts Heney to become a candidate, and that Mr. Spreckels and Mr. Phelan have as deep a personal interest in the matter as Mr. Heney himself. It is our judgment that the evidence against Mr. Heney as disclosed by the record in the Calhoun case is much stronger than the evidence against Mr. Calhoun.

The American Jeremiah

Whenever James J. Hill utters himself on the State of Affairs and the Signs of the Times his views create a deep impression in many quarters. He is regarded as a profound thinker and a keen observer, his admirers believe him to be something of an oracle. At present they are discussing the philosophic reflections and lugubrious predictions made by him on his last public appearance, the occasion of which was the opening of the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition, when he platitudinized with characteristic solemnity on the dangers that beset the Republic and the importance of simplicity, economy, equality and justice. According to Mr. Hill our earlier ideals have been warped by ostentatious follies "and it may require a considerable readjustment of our industrial system and a reform in our very conception of the relations between a government and its citizens before the standard of absolute equality before the law can be restored"; furthermore, "we are steering the ship of state among shifting and conflicting currents, now full speed ahead and now full speed astern, and unless we follow the course of equal justice shipwreck lies somewhere ahead." Mr. Hill is a dismal prophet. With him prophecy has become a trade which he practices with enthusiasm, and he is at all times entertaining. We are not inclined, however, to the opinion that the state of affairs is as bad as he affirms. The tendency of the times which he laments is the tendency against which prophets have been preaching since the world began. Whenever a people becomes prosperous there is developed a tendency toward luxury and a passion for sensual indulgence, and with class distinctions come envy, hatred and injustice and clamorous demands for reform. It usually happens that in striving to set things right weak mortals in their conceit and ignorance hasten the very ills which they most dread. What we should most lament in this country today is that we are paying too little attention to the spiritual condition of society and too much to the matter of mechanical improvement. We are becoming too "governmentish," too much addicted to the patent nostrums that are guaranteed to cure all political and sociological ills. But we should not be pessimistic. Other peoples similarly distracted have recovered from their obsessions and glimpsed the light, and we shall probably have the same good fortune. We are not sick to dissolution, we are not writhing in the last agony. There are masses of diseased matter in the body politic, but there are vital forces to hurl them aside.

The Vices of Society

After Mr. Hill come the minor but more vociferous prophets who discern portentous phenomena in the sporadic instances of depravity and licentiousness which are supplied by our vulgar plutocracy. For them the Gould case is a pregnant example. Its episodes are characteristic of an effete society immersed in vulgar frivolity and devoted to a life of "dizzy staggerings and tarantula jiggings." In a voice of thunder, with a deep tone of wisdom, they warn us of the inevitable consequences of our loose morals. By law of Fate they see us drifting at all moments with frightful regularity to our end, which is Destruction. To believe them is to be convinced that New York is Babylon the mother of abominations, whence flows the wine of iniquity that is making the nation drunk. To heed their alarm is to assume that the atmosphere of the Castle Gould is generated wherever the Sons of Mammon congregate and that all Newport is reeling in orgies similar to those of the Palais Royal presided over by the Duchess de Berri. These minor and vociferous prophets ought not to be taken seriously. They have adopted the tone, the manner and the conscience of the exponents of muckrakishness. Doubtless there is much among us that might justly be likened unto a whited sepulchre, and unquestionably there is much of splendid immorality and purple vice among the ridiculously rich, but society is far from being rotten to the core. The rich of the world are seldom rightly bred, but there is no alarming lack of decency among the rich of this country. Puritanism has not been entirely banished from our plutocracy. Smart society is frivolous and gay, shallow and vulgar, but smart society constitutes a very small portion of the population of this country. Wealth and the power we have acquired over material nature have increased the ease and luxury of our lives, but it is absurd to assert that as a people we are approximating the high pitch of degraded refinement that marked the beginning of the end of the ancient Greeks and Romans. The fact is that we have not yet reached the stage of intellectual development at which a people begins the cultivation of the hideous vices that sap vitality and lead to dissolution. Some of our plutocrats are beginning to exhibit a taste for splendid palaces, and doubtless it would please them to collect Etruscan bronzes, Attic pottery, Babylonian carpets and Coan curtains after the manner of the cultured Greeks who substituted for the coarse cloaks of the heroes of Marathon the most delicate fabrics and went about with painted faces and smelling of sweet unguents, but there has not yet developed among us that significant growth of sentiment which marks the transition from material cares to fanciful channels and is invariably characteristic of the highest and most dangerous state of civilization. Even our plutocrats are still too busy to cultivate a taste for the seven deadly vices. The only mortal sins which they are inclined to are those which have been peculiar to hucksters since the days of Abraham, and with respect to these we should not be too cocksure in our judgment. Things which appear to be good or evil are in fact so mixed up and interdependent that evil is often the parent of good, and good sometimes the parent of evil. Consequently we can never be sure what practice or custom will lead to destruction. As the omission of a single unit in an intricate calculation disturbs the final result, so in the great reckoning of human history no positive general knowledge can be reached without facilities far surpassing those of man.

The Civic Missionary Spirit

The one hundred San Francisco boosters who went to Portland and Seattle by special train with two objects, one to have a whooping good time at the exposition and the other to boom the Portola Festival, seem to have achieved success in both directions. They tore through the country in pyrotechnic manner, leaving our northern neighbors somewhat stunned by their ebullience of spirit, their good fellowship and their energy. The rivalry that exists between the seaport cities of this coast was forgotten for the time, and the visitors were given a royal reception. To be sure they will soon be hammering each other again in the scramble for shipping and population, but it is good to bury the hatchet now and then and take stock of the forces one has to contend with. Doubtless hosts and guests alike learned something to their advantage. The boosters exemplified the open-handed spirit that has done so much for San Francisco—and the recklessness of temperament that is at once a help and a detriment to this city. And no doubt, if they were not too busy having a good time they absorbed some of the pull-together spirit that San Francisco has to a less degree than any other city on the Pacific Coast. The community is almost invincible now—it would be overpowering in its march toward progress if there were more of a disposition to put every shoulder to the right side of the wheel, instead of pushing from opposite directions. As to the Portola Festival, it is gaining fame. One commissioner is abroad with the object of having the nations of Europe send their battleships here for the great occasion; and he appears to be succeeding. Another has started out to bring to San Francisco on the finest special train that can be fitted out the leading hotel men of the world. Portola "stickers" are going to the corners of the earth on most of the letters that leave San Francisco. Altogether the city and its coming period of joy and jubilation are being well advertised; but it is safe to say that it has been the most strongly impressed on the minds of the people among whom the one hundred whirlwind boosters spread the gospel of "Everybody foregather at San Francisco in October."

but containing a pay streak that seems never likely to pinch out. Our temples of justice daily furnish theme for the humorous writer's pen—not through the character of the cases that come up in them, which are about the same the country over, but because of the manner in which the cases are conducted. Let us suggest two judges, one defendant and one assistant district attorney as characters and the trial of Emery C. Grace as the basis of the plot. There is no need to seek further than in the court record for the comic relief. Brace was up before Judge Frank Dunne for embezzlement, and the jury having retired late in the evening, his honor asked Judge Lawlor to receive the verdict. Judge Lawlor complied, and appeared in court at eleven o'clock in obedience to a summons. The jury had no verdict, but it needed instructions. Judge Lawlor having heard none of the testimony, did not feel quite qualified to instruct, so asked for some information regarding the case—just a hint as to what it was all about being all that one of his well balanced judicial mind needed. Assistant District Attorney Louis Ferrari, who prosecuted the case was not there, but the attorney for the defense was, and taking full advantage of the opportunity, he gave the bench a fervid account of the great wrong that was being done his client in haling him before a court of justice. Judge Lawlor, being accustomed to deciding points of law on the say-so of a single attorney gave his instructions, and almost immediately the jury brought in a verdict of not guilty. When Judge Dunne heard of the affair in the morning he let loose his wrath upon Ferrari for not being on hand to hand out a little "dope" for the guidance of the court in the matter of instructions; and Ferrari, getting mad, delivered his opinion of the judiciary of San Francisco with particular reference to one certain member of it. Then he packed up his law books and left, vowing that he would prosecute cases in Judge Dunne's court no longer. The "kangaroo" courts, held by hoboes in the county jails for the trial of fellow prisoners on petty charges are of overpowering dignity in comparison with some that are conducted in our midst.

Perspective Impressions

Like the perennial peerless one of Nebraska Mr. Heney is ready for another trial.

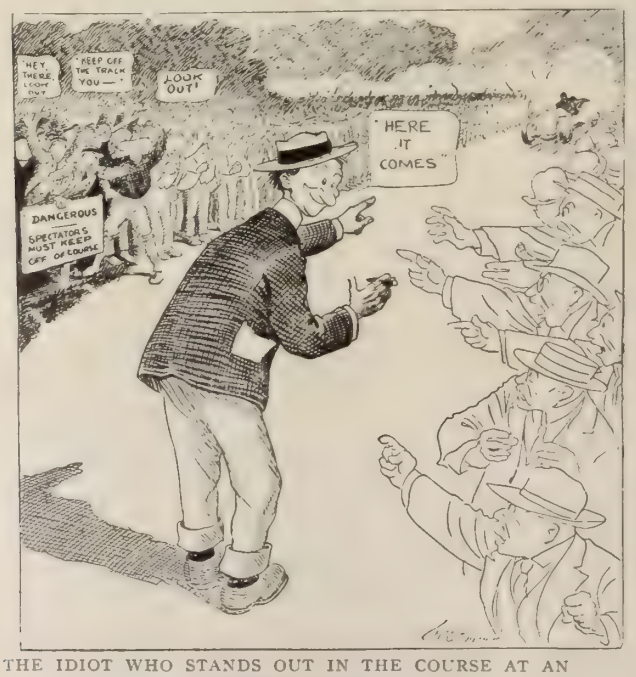
Is there nobody with sufficient magnanimity to suggest that Mayor Taylor ought to run again?

Mr. Moore says that the Calhoun trial was a farce. The title we suppose is "Are You a Mason?"

The insane extravagance of our public servants is not catching. The taxpayers have called a halt.

The tall and the short footpads are at it again; and when they have finished, their victim is always short.

The Stockton coroner, needing jurors, raided a lodge room while an initiation was going on, and impressed six members into service. He certainly got their goat.



The search for a candidate for mayor is proving as unsuccessful as our last election of one.

It appears that no man who has ever had the courage of his convictions will be able to qualify for the mayoralty under the beneficent Direct Primary.

As soon as it was learned that Frank J. Sullivan had not been attacked in the rear suspicion was detached from the Hon. James D. Phelan.

Millions for war and nothing for the aftermath seems to be the policy of this nation, judging by its starvation policy in conducting the old soldiers' homes.

Professor Foulet, who called President Jordan of Stanford a liar for saying that the French nation is decadent, arrived in town Saturday, but told the reporters that he was too tired to talk. Jordan has a faculty for making people tired.

Mountain Air for City Waifs

"The cry of the children" is never louder in the city than during the summer months, when the dry, bare hills and the hot, shadeless streets make the contrast between the green fields, the sea side and the mountains most emphatic, when in the language of the Bible, the very trees "clap their hands for joy." Fresh air enterprises are a recognized institution in the East, but here in California less is said and done to furnish opportunities for recreation and recuperation to the unfortunate city child. The homeless child is a national problem. The reason why a child is homeless does not affect the fact that there are thousands of little ones of tender years who know the bitter sting of poverty and the lack of care. In the absence of parental responsibility, somebody must take up the abandoned or neglected duties. Four years ago the Volunteers of America undertook the task. An old fashioned residence at 812 Shotwell street was secured and here the Maud Ballington Booth Home was established. Since its inception nine hundred waifs have been sheltered under its hospitable roof. The children who have been cared for may be divided into two classes: those into whose homes poverty, sickness and death have entered, and the mother, forced to become the bread winner, is unable to give adequate care to her offspring; second, those whose parents, drunken and otherwise degraded, are unfit to have children entrusted to their care. The physical condition of these neglected children is deplorable. They are stunted for lack of sufficient and proper food, and in the case of those whose unnatural parents have abused them they often bear through life the consequences of the brutal treatment. The Mount Hermon Association has offered the management of the Maud B. Booth Home the use of fifty acres of ground in the heart of the Santa Cruz mountains, seven hundred feet above the sea level, where, under the shade of the pine trees, a hundred children may romp and play through the long days of summer. The inmates of the home range in years from the toddlers of two or three to fourteen. Among them is one hopeless cripple who is by common consent the pet of the institution, and the older children often forego their share in the games in order that little Douglas, unable to drag himself to the playground, or take any share in the sports, may be amused and interested. It is interesting to see these little waifs, rescued from the yardless tenements and the narrow, dark paved streets, when they first emerge into the sunshine and are able to see more than a narrow strip of the blue sky. Every garden and grass plat becomes to them a "park," and a flower a treasure. Unconsciously they expand their lungs, as though for the first time realizing that fresh air is not a costly luxury, and only those who know the hampered lives they have led in the environment which is their only conception of "home" can realize what it means to them to be free to play without fear of being run down by heavy teams or "run in by the cop." Open air and sunshine are as essential to children as to plants, and often no other treatment is needed for the delicate child. Roses bloom in sallow cheeks, and wobbling and uncertain steps grow firm when brought into contact with mother earth under proper conditions. It is generally admitted that the stamina gained by the country-bred youth enables him in the long run to outlast his town-bred brother, and who can measure the advantages which he carries with him in the memories of the thousand and one unpurchaseable joys which are his by right? The city child has none of these. Even the best favored must be content with a few odd days in the park, where, at most, there is but an elaborate effort to imitate nature. The slum child, who looks upon a slip of common geranium grown in a tin can as little short of a miracle, is bereft of the best of its heritage. It is for such as these that an appeal is made. The administration is so economical that it is going to cost only ten dollars per child for the whole two months of this projected outing, lasting over July and August. Mrs. William Tevis, Mrs. Phoebe Hearst, Mrs. Nickel, Mrs. William H. Crocker and others prominent in social and philanthropic affairs are supporting a number of children each, and the project needs but to be known to interest others as deeply. It is the city which reaps the benefit of every effort put forth to save children from the results of causes which they are powerless to influence, and to improve their lot. A child reclaimed is a power for good. The Ambrosial Decoction Called Punch

By Major Ben C. Truman

The ruling favorite of all compounded American drinks is the Punch;—and its phases are as many as the leaves of Vallambrosa. It approaches the julep closely in the assimilation of its ingredients and proportions, and is quite as mischievous if dallied with recklessly. The leading punches in glass doses are whisky, brandy, rum and claret; and champagne, claret and whisky punches by the bowlful.

In every punch the ambrosial oil of the lemon should be properly extracted by rubbing lumps of sugar on the rind, which break the delicate little vessels containing the essence, and at the same time absorb it. This, with making the mixture sweet and strong, even to the substitution of tea for water, and thoroughly amalgamating all the ingredients, so that neither the taste of the bitter and the sweet or the spirit shall be perceptible, the one over the other, is the secret in the making the delicious drink called punch. In hot punch and toddy the spirits should be put in before the water, and in cold punch and toddy the reverse. Home-drinkers should remember this. The proportions of acidity and sweetness, and of spirits and water, have no real rule; the tastes of drinkers being as unlike as their faces.

The American punch grew out of the toddy;—which cannot be traced, as some drinkers have sweetend and diluted their "bitters" from away back hundreds of years. Admitting a division as to whether the honor of the discovery of the julep rightly belongs to Virginia or Pennsylvania, there can be no doubt regarding the parentage of the punch—and that said distinction belongs to Georgia.

Be this as it may, the American punch is made (in his own way) by every bar-tender in our land and is imitated by artists in hard drink preparations all over the world. In the Holy Land—near the Sea of Galilee and the Garden of Gethsemane; in Egypt—on the Nile near the Temple of Luxor and in the very shadow of Cheops; in Pompeii, in Tunis and Algiers; and in all the countries of Europe there is the "American Bar," and at some of these establishments I have seen really acceptable concoctions rejoicing in proportions called punch. To be sure, some of these so-called punches were not of the high-class New Orleans, San Francisco, Saratoga, Newport, Del Monte, Pontchartrain and Coronado variety. But what's in a name when one is in Assouan, Tangier, Jericho or Herculaneum?

While a perfect whisky punch may be made in much the same way as a perfect julep, omitting the mint, those who would care to prepare a small vessel of this ambrosial decoction in a truly scientific manner for the delectation of a few bon vivants may conscientiously execute the following formula:

Experiment has proved that the juice of three or four lemons and three-quarters of a pound of loaf sugar dissolved in about three pints of boiling water produces saporous waves which strike the palate at such intervals that the sourness of the lemon and the sweetness of the sugar are no longer distinguishable. We have, in fact, a harmony of saporific notes. The pitch, however, is too low; and to heighten it we infuse into the boiling water the fragrant rind of one lemon. Here we might pause, after cooling the mixture, if the soul of man craves no higher result than lemonade. But, to obtain the culminating saporosity of punch, we must dash into the bowl at least a pint of rum and nearly the same volume of whisky or brandy. The molecules of alcohol, sugar, and citric acid collide; an entirely new series of vibration is produced—tremors to which the dullest palate is attuned. In punch, then, we have rhythm within rhythm, and all that philosophy can do is to take kindly to its subtle harmonies.

Savannah has one established and historic institution that deserves notice. This is her famous "Artillery Punch." It is delightfully palatable, but insidiously strong. It has become celebrated as an instrument of hospitality. Its history is this: Back in the fifties the Republican Blues, which were organized in 1808, visited Macon and were welcomed back by the Chatham Artillery. Mr. A. B. Luce, since dead, proposed to brew a new punch in honor of the Blues. Mr. Wm. Davidson furnished the spirits. The concoction was thus made: One of the horse buckets of ordinary size was filled with finely-crushed ice. A quart each of good whisky and rum was poured into the ice, and sugar and lemon added. The bucket was filled to the brim with champagne, and the whole stirred into a delirious deliciousness—and "Rumor" started the story next day that every solitary man of the Blues had been put under the table by this diabolical and most delightful compound. From that day "Artillery Punch" has been a regular convivial institution of Oglethorpe's genial city, and as a vanquisher of men its equal has never been found. It is as mild as syllabub, seemingly, but it conquers like a cyclone.

Another Southern punch—the "New South"—is an aristocrat among American drinks, and has been described by the bartender at Chamberlain's as follows: "It is based on a Southern idea in the mixed drinks line with what you might call some Yankee filigree work added. It is elaborate and costly, but beautiful in its artistic combination. You get a large Tom Collins glass, made especially for the purpose of thin crystal; squeeze into it the juice of an orange and a lemon, and add two teaspoonsful of sugar. Then pour in a pony of best whisky and a tablespoonful each of Curacoa and Maraschino, and add seltzer. Shake this combination up thoroughly, and then fill up the rest of the tall glass with cracked ice; pack the ice in a mound at the top and hollow the mound out in the center. You make the hollow in the ice to permit the introduction of about two tablespoonsful of the best vanilla ice cream, and then ornament the cream with berries. The effect is something that is architectural and stunning. The wine and cordials give the mixture a delicious aroma, in the first place, and it is exquisitely refreshing and palatable. (If for ladies, substitute claret wine for whisky and just a dash of the latter.)

Another new punch is the Hong Kong—a decided novelty, and just the thing for a hot day: Take a cup of cold Oolong tea, (the best brand in the market), put a teaspoonful of sugar in it, and pour in a pony of French brandy; pack in cracked ice on top of the mixture, and add a half a pony of the best Jamaica rum. It's an eccentric combination, but it cools you off and tickles your palate with a new sort of delight.

A delicious offering is the Leland punch, invented by Dan Lace (formerly purveyor of the Windsor Hotel in New York) and highly praised by Tom Ochiltree, George Alfred Townsend, John Russell Young, Joe Howard, and others: Take a tablespoonful of sugar and one of raspberry syrup, a tablespoonful of curacoa, a wine-glass of Jamaica rum, half as much brandy, and the juice of half a lemon; fill up the glass with shaved ice; and when the compound is thoroughly blended, add a dash of port-wine, a finish of floating fruits, and imbibe through a straw.

And still another is the Harry Gillig punch, a captivating and expensive drink intended particularly for swells. To make this punch, take the juice of a rich lime and a spoonful of sugar, add a small glass of seltzer and a wine

The Crimson Hand

(From the French of Nonce Casanova)

With Lakdar ben Cherif I had roamed the Saharan sands from Gadames to Oued Mia. He was a great chief and I loved him like a brother. I knew that he was devoted to me. "My heart," he often said to me, "is a spring of cold water where you can quench your thirst whenever you wish, my brother." In sign of brotherhood we had touched together the sprigs of basil that waved in an earthen pot in the Zauoia of Sidi Abd-er-Rhaman, and also the wonderful Koran that rests in the m'koutcha of the Djama-Djedid. So you can imagine what pleasure it was to me, one evening last summer, to meet Lakdar in Kataroudjil street. We kissed each other's hands in delight, and our hearts beat high with joy; then our emotion burst forth in a torrent of words that recalled all the details of the nine months we had passed together down there.

"When shall you leave Algiers?"

"Tomorrow evening."

"So soon?"

"I must go back. The sheiks of El Berg are calling me. I must go and make peace among those robbers of Touaregs. Would you like to come with me? There will be plenty to do, you know. I must be at Dongola as soon as I possibly can."

"No, thanks. I want to breathe the bad air of the boulevards. Later, perhaps, I may think of it. Where were you going when I met you?"

"To Yamina's," he answered, while his face lighted up with a smile. "You do not know Yamina, do you?"

I made a vague gesture in the negative.

"Ah, my dear fellow, one must know Yamina if one wants to pillow one's heart on a bed of honey and flowers like the Prophet's."

"Pretty, eh?"

A rough exclamation expressed the greatest admiration he could conceive.

"You," he said, taking my hand, "own the half of my life, and I bear you in my heart. I can have no fear that you should cast your eyes upon Yamina. Come, I will take you to her house. She must be waiting, for it is the appointed hour and I have not yet come."

We made our way silently through the staring brilliance of the white-washed houses, under a band of sombre sky into which the latticed balconies projected.

"It is quite near here, my brother."

We continued through narrow alleys filled with acrid smells and the humming of djouaks, kouistras and tambourines. From time to time my heart was fired by beautiful black eyes that watched us pass from behind gratings overhung with garlands of jasmines and tuberoses.

"Here it is."

I experienced a pleasurable feeling of curiosity, and my first impression was very favorable.

"Behold, O golden mouth," said Lakdar, presenting me, "him whose shadow has mingled with my shadow in the sands of the desert!"

I bowed.

"Yamina's house," she said to me, "is the house of those who dwell in Lakdar's mind and heart," and inviting us to seats amid the piles of cushions on the floor, she made a sign to a little negress to light chibouks for us.

While Lakdar was telling her of some adventure that had befallen him that morning at Mustapha Superieur, I inspected the charms of Yamina, who lay curled up upon a divan before us. She was dressed in loose trousers of blue satin, embroidered with silver, and a very elegant jacket of garnet velvet. She had rolled up her hair under a golden maharma, the bediamonded fringe of which caressed her cheeks. She wore very few jewels—a slender gold chain securing a ruby at the middle of her forehead, a heavy coral bracelet on her right arm, and krolkrals of soft gold on her ankles.

A sudden glance that she threw at me quite upset me; it did not waver, and it seemed to overflow like an evil black wave from her eyes, which were dark with antimony. It told I know not what message of impurity, evil, crime.

Finally, to drive away the sensation of fear that had benumbed my mind, I tried to interest myself in my surroundings. The room had the ordinary appearance of all Moorish interiors. About the walls were little gilded etageres, gazelles' horns from which hung miniature narghilehs for smoking kieff, odd little tables on which the names of the chapters of the Koran in golden letters formed arabesques, and ostrich eggs ornamented with tassels of red silk. Near us was a round table of blue enamel covered with flowers, cigarettes, cups set in dainty filigree shells enriched with coral, and an ivory coffer enameled with daisies, birds and fantastic roses, and—suddenly my heart leaped with fear!

On a little square of silk thrown over this coffer I saw the crimson imprint of a hand. It was but a small thing. I reassured myself with the thought that it was simply the sign with which the Arabs protect their houses against the evil eye. But a profound uneasiness had taken possession of me. I made a movement to rise. My head was heavy. The odor of djupil burning in a little censer of white earthenware, together with the aroma of hasheesh, had befogged my brain.

It seemed to me that a long time had passed. I managed to tear my eyes away from that bloody hand and saw that Lakdar had fallen asleep with his head on Yamina's pearly bosom. I did not want to see the woman. I was afraid of the look I had just met. Oh, that look! It was kin to that bloody hand. A painful dizziness dulled my mind. I trembled. Then I tried to make one more effort—I attempted to laugh, to persuade myself that I was not afraid. Only a hollow rattle came from my throat.

At that moment the rays of the sun fell on the ivory coffer; the square of silk glowed, and all at once it seemed to me that that bloody hand was alive with a terrible life, that it contracted, that it was coming toward me to tear out my soul. What horrible moments I lived through then! However, my confusion was not so great that I could not hear certain noises outside: the monotonous snoring of a gombri and a durburka, the clatter of Jewish clogs on the pavement, the sharp voices of the children of a neighboring school chanting verses from the Koran. Oh, that hand! I kept my eyes upon it, and the intoxication of the hasheesh opened a thousand abysses before me. I dropped my extinguished chibouk with a gesture of disgust, and at the same moment a gentle voice whispered in my ear.

"What is the matter with you, my friend?" it asked.

I turned. Yamina had left the divan and was crouching beside me. She laid her little, henna-dyed hands on my shoulders. In a brief ecstasy I saw the shining of her eyes, and her voice lulled me with its sweetness. Still, a certain uneasiness pressed heavily upon me.

A Cruel Blow

At the banquet in honor of General "Jim" Smith certain phenomena excited much comment. The tone of the affair was such as to give the impression that civic consciousness of the brand with which we are most familiar had fallen asleep at the switch. Patriotism was the keynote of the affair, but it was not the patriotism which we have been wont to exalt in San Francisco. The noisy, ostentatious patriotism that has flourished here and that is incarnated in the bewhiskered person of the Hon. James D. Phelan was suffered to languish in humiliating silence. Imagine "Our Jimmy" at a banquet doing nothing but feeding his face and rhetorical batteries thundering all around him. This gallant young millionaire is surcharged with eloquence. In all his life he never failed to respond to a call for a speech. He never went to a banquet that he wasn't primed with a speech. With him it is second nature to take the floor and the most cruel of hardships to be compelled to hold his seat. Hence the grievousness of the outrage that was perpetrated at the Smith banquet when Mr. Phelan was consigned to the oppressive silence of the remote background.

Uneasy Judges

Mr. Phelan was not the only patriot that suffered mental anguish at the Smith banquet. To the Hon. William P. Lawlor and the Hon. Frank H. Dunne was meted out the cruel and inhuman punishment of each other's society. Far beyond the glow of the limelight were they, and scant was the attention they received from the other guests. It soon became apparent that the atmosphere of the banquet hall was not all pleasing to them. Judge Lawlor, who always exhibits the red badge of courage at the rampart of food, faltered just beyond the olives when he discovered that Samuel M. Shortridge and George A. Knight were on the program. There are many distinguished members of the local Bar that have lamented the pliancy of certain judges but none in language quite so impassioned as that which Mr. Knight and Mr. Shortridge have employed. Yet they were asked to speak at the Smith banquet. Lawlor and Dunne wanted to know the reason why. It is said that they even asked ex-Judge J. F. Sullivan to give them an explanation and that he did so in words that were short if not ugly. It was by Judge Sullivan that Knight and Shortridge were put on the program.

Judge Morrow's Pertinent Remarks

Somewhat more painful to Dunne and Lawlor than the recognition that was given to Knight and Shortridge was the speech that was made by Judge Morrow. This distinguished Federal jurist was called upon to respond to the toast "The Bench," and he proceeded to give utterance to sentiments that caused Lawlor and Dunne to squirm and perspire. Judge Morrow said that it was the theory of the founders of our government that the Executive should wield the sword, that the Legislature should handle the purse and that the Bench should protect the rights of the individual. The rights of the individual he declared to be paramount to all else, thus dissenting from the views expressed by O'Gara during the Calhoun trial. Judge Morrow said that he knew General Smith was a brave man because he had heard that the General was willing to become a judge. It required considerable bravery these days, he said, for a judge to expound the law that protects the rights of the citizen. He added that we need brave men in the judiciary, men that were prepared to fight in defense of the law, and with a smile he remarked that brave judges of the type of Chief Justice Beatty were probably becoming lonesome in the State courts.

Bring on the Big Feed

What San Francisco needs is more banquets, more occasions for the letting off of steam and the exchange of views and sentiments. This is an opportune time for assembling at the groaning board and giving public sentiment a chance to show that it has undergone something of a change in recent months. In a city dominated by a press controlled by special interests and selfish individuals it is important that there should be some medium for the dissemination of the views of men who have concern for the welfare of the community. The banquet in my opinion will serve the purpose. In ancient Athens when the people seemed to be growing negligent of their civic obligations it was always possible to arouse them by a production of the "Persae" of Aeschylus. After witnessing that odic drama the people went forth uttering lamentations. And all the night they thronged before the temple, men, women and children, beating now their breasts and now the shields that hung on the doors of the shrine, crying between their sobs, Athens, Athens, Athens! "Woe, at such a time," says a modern author, "to any man who dared stand out as Tyrant, and double woe to any set of men who dared trifle with the honor and rights of Hellas!" In lieu of a drama instant in its potency we have the gastronomic revel to excite. It is at the postprandial feast of reason and flow of soul that the modern citizen is most amenable to the emotional appeal. The get-together spirit is more easily stimulated between the grape fruit and the nuts than at any other time. Let us have a big banquet consecrated to the civic welfare, and let us hear from representatives of all classes of citizens barring only the professional patriots. There are many merchants, bankers, professional men, clerks and artizans who have the welfare of this city at heart, but who have never been found promoting selfish ends in any so-called civic or political organization. It might be instructive and interesting to hear from them.

Important News Suppressed

It was as the result of a banquet last week, by the way, that the people of San Francisco obtained some authoritative information on the subject of the conduit electric railway system which has frequently moved our leading publicists to flights of eloquence in recent years. The guest of honor at the banquet, which was given by Joseph D. Redding and Thornwall Mullally, was General George H. Harries, District Commander of Washington, D. C., President of the Board of Trade and Superintendent of the interurban traction system. As the conduit system is in operation in Washington General Harries knows something about its merits and shortcomings. At the banquet it received his unqualified condemnation.

He says that it is the least practicable of all traction systems; that it is easily deranged and difficult to repair, and consequently it does not give satisfaction. The Washington system, according to General Harries, is a white elephant on the hands of the people. The information that General Harries gave at the banquet was of especial interest to the people of this city, for persistent effort has been made here to promote a sentiment in favor of the conduit system, but the Chronicle was the only paper that gave publicity to his remarks. The other newspapers having advocated the conduit system, and being too parochial to publish any news that might serve to belie editorial assertions, consigned their reports of the banquet to the waste-paper basket. And thus was emphasis given to the importance of bringing people together and redeeming them from dependence on a pig-headed press.

Workmanship and Theme

A local book reviewer finds fault with Edgar Saltus because he selects themes that bring the blush of shame to the cheek of innocence. It is admitted by this reviewer that Saltus has beauty of style, extreme brilliance, vivid color, exquisite taste in diction; that he is readable and thoroughly enjoyable in the reading; and that altogether he is a writer of extraordinary ability and supreme quality. I think I can say in answer to this reviewer that if Saltus is a good writer it doesn't matter much what he writers. It is the bad book badly written that is to be condemned; or the "noble theme" badly handled may be equally condemned. The cardinal sin of literary pretension is bad writing. After that it may be said that a false view of the thing written about is almost as bad as bad writing. If the writer presents his theme as it is; if he holds the mirror up to nature he may be excused many faults of diction, and that is the only condonation or extenuation he may claim. It is the falsehood that is criminal, not the act of exploiting something immoral, repulsive or even horrible. There are scores of immoralities of the grossest character in classic literature that no book reviewer would dare to condemn. Applied to Rabelais, Boccaccio, Voltaire, Balzac or Maupassant the criticism passed upon Saltus by this book reviewer would subject the critic to laughter, jeers and the scorn of the judicious. The immorality of a work is not in its subject, but in the manner of its treatment. A Venus by Praxiteles would not be immoral in its utter nudity; but a copy of that Venus by an inferior sculptor would be positively indecent. The reason that Richard Harding Davis or Laura Jean Libbey do not offend as Edgar Saltus seems to have offended this over-squeamish book reviewer, is because Richard Harding Davis and Laura Jean Libbey cannot write as well as Saltus writes.

Planting Literary Colonies

It has been reported many a time that Californian millionaires here and there were arranging to set out plantations of tender green spring poets. Many an ironic jest of one generation becomes the sober fact of the next. We learn now that there are two of these artificial literary plantations actually contemplated, but it is not the millionaires who are risking their good gold coin on freak crops. Within a week it has been reported that Joaquin Miller will deliver no more lectures, and that he will subdivide his property on the Heights into one-acre tracts which he will donate to kindred spirits of the pen, while Jack London, returned from his abandoned voyage scarcely begun, will erect cottages on his Glen Ellen tract to be occupied by his friends. There are no communistic features advertised in connection with either project which, apparently contemplates nothing more than the gathering together within contracted limits of a number of persons of allied tastes, but one need raise no hopes of increased or improved literary output from this "intensified farming," for the artistic temperament is notoriously difficult. More than once it has been curtly described as just temper and bad temper at that. Most of the artificial colonies, for whatever purpose the people are brought together, end in disaster. If there is not open feud, accusation and recrimination, there is disintegration and emphatic silence more eloquent than words. The London and Miller settlements may not accomplish much for the advancement of letters but they will be pretty sure to furnish some lively news items.

Shifting the Red Light

The red light district of Oakland is about to move on, and the undesirable citizens who have long plied their nefarious trades in the very face of law and order as symbolized by the county's public buildings will be obliged to find new quarters for themselves—it is too much to expect that they will really retire. For years the voices of Oakland's clergy have been lifted in protest against the colonization of these objectionable ones under the very shadow of Justice, but all to no purpose. Pulpit oratory has been drowned by the chink of coin at last, and a soulless corporation has succeeded where spiritual warfare has been waged in vain. On the tide of progress which has swept the Western Pacific into Oakland the tenderloin will be floated eastward and unceremoniously deposited with the muck of Chinatown. The official edict has gone forth that at their expiration the leases are not to be renewed to present tenants or their ilk, and in the course of a year or two the neighborhood of the Hall of Records and the County Jail will be cleansed by automatic process. It is not yet known to what use the vacated area will be dedicated, but no one cares particularly, since any change must be for the better, and it is sufficient for the righteous to know that the moral blot has been literally railroaded into a shady section, and that the red light of danger is to make way for the white signal of "clear track."

A Native Returns

From London, by cable, we learn that James Hamilton Lewis of Chicago is on his way home after a swift tour of the Orient in which he gathered important information to be exclusively transmitted to the State Department concerning political conditions in Asia. The gravity of Mr. Lewis's message is faintly reflected in the statement which he has condescended to give out to the world in the opinion that America will be involved in conflict with China in less than ten years. It cannot be said hereafter that ample time was not allowed by this statesman in which we might prepare ourselves for the worst. It will be entirely our own fault if, in less that ten years, we do not, as advised by Mr. Lewis, "make an alliance with England in Asia for the mutual protection of British and American commerce," on penalty of being "forced singly to contest with Germany and England for a place in Asia." It is not quite clear to the outsider how this country can be vitally involved in something that does not exist; nor why England should be expected to favor an alliance with America "for the mutual protection" of a commerce over which England at this moment holds a virtual monopoly. No doubt Statesman Lewis is loaded with data which other statesmen and even wiser folk have been unable to correlate from their knowledge, observation and experience, for, like Statesman Barrett, late of Siam and the Near Orient and more recently adviser-in-ordinary to the Latin republics of America, Statesman Lewis is essentially wise in his own conceit, and not at all backward in its expression upon every favorable opportunity and inopportunity. At any rate it will not be the fault of Statesman Lewis if this country is in a state of unpreparedness when we are finally "involved in that conflict in China" which his prophetic soul so clear-visions in the shadows cast by coming events.

An Impending Conflict

It seems to be the opinion of Statesman Lewis, based unquestionably on first-hand information, that Germany is our worst foe "insidious" and otherwise in this Oriental commerce situation. He says that the Germans in the Orient are doing all they can to incite dislike for Americans and Englishmen, and that they are particularly virulent in their denunciation of all commodities of commerce not "made in Germany." It is a grave charge that Statesman Lewis brings against the German traders of the Far East, but I am inclined to disagree with his inference that the German government is ignorant of the course pursued by its representatives in Japan and China and that if the government knew about it disapproval would immediately ensue at Berlin. On the contrary it is my firm belief that the German government not only knows how shamefully its representatives are talking about us and how libelously German traders in the Orient are decrying the quality of things made in America and England, but that these representatives and peddlers are directly encouraged in their villainous practices by all the Hohenzollerns, the unanimous Diet and the mass of the German people, and especially by those who are profiting beyond their dreams of avarice from the steadily increasing German trade in Japan, China and all Asia. I am not asserting that this reprehensible conduct towards a friendly nation on the part of the Germans is not a casus belli, nor am I contending that if we had commercial relations with the Orient our representatives and traders would not retort in kind upon the Germans and their brummagem wares. I merely suggest in this connection that before we proceed to the extremity of "conflict in China" we make an effort to convince the benighted and credulous Orientals that everything "made in Germany" is a fraudulent pretense and a fake of the deepest dye. When we are convinced that we can't outlie the Germans in the open market of the Orient it will be time to declare war on somebody, Germany preferred, because if we can get rid of the Germans in the Orient England will get a strangle hold on the trade of Asia and we can continue to do business through British hongs, British compradores and British banks who invariably push American goods in preference to German goods when they do not come into competition with British goods.

Not a "Weak Brother"

A Eureka correspondent writes me: "The action of Governor Gillett in rebuking General Lauck of the National Guard for accepting the hospitality of the manager of the McCloud Lumber Company while at McCloud for the purpose of quelling the strikers, is no surprise to the people of Humboldt county, for they are acquainted with the executive's independence of spirit. An instance in point is when there was a longshoreman's strike here while Gillett was running for governor. The best boats that ran between San Francisco and Eureka had been declared non-union, and some of our local politicians endured great bodily discomfort through traveling back and forth in small, cramped steamships with a poor table and worse beds. But Gillett traveled on the boats he had been accustomed to patronizing—the non-union boats, as it happened. Had they been union he would have traveled on them just the same."

The Profits of Patriotism

Those were startling figures that were published by the Chronicle last Wednesday for the purpose of showing what the Calhoun trial cost. But what the trial cost the taxpayers doesn't interest me half so much as the earnings of that stalwart civic patriot Francis J. Heney during the period of his enlistment in the cause of civic righteousness. It appears that since Mr. Heney began patriotizing professionally he has received some sixty odd thousand dollars from the Federal government and twenty-two thousand dollars in round numbers from the good Mr. Spreckels. I say that it appears that Mr. Heney has received these sums, but the inference is not imperative that he received nothing more. We know that his partner Mr. Cobb, who got the benefit of the "expense" money put up by the good Mr. Spreckels to pay the firm's office rent and incidentals and et ceteras, received on the side a small fortune, but this he doesn't have to divide with Mr. Heney. There was a long period during which Mr. Cobb thought he would have to divide with his partner, but the misapprehension has been dispelled. Mr. Heney, however, has fared pretty well, and it is evident that he is entitled to the felicitations of the dear old ladies of the League of Justice and all sympathetic citizens who were compassionating him some months ago on his noble self-sacrifice. It has been profitable patriotizing for Mr. Heney. As a public servant he has fared better than as a private practitioner. The circumstance that there is a receipt bearing his signature in the archives of the Contra Costa Water Company for thirty-five thousand dollars has probably given the impression that he earned that sum in private practice, but the receipt, though prima facie evidence, is not conclusive. There is some mystery attached to that receipt which Mr. Heney has never cared to solve, but on which he will undoubtedly shed the light as soon as he opens his campaign for district attorney. I have heard it said that he never received the money; also that when he was employed by the company it was not because his services were needed but because his friends thought he needed a little assistance. In those days—and they were not remote—Mr. Heney's office expenses were light but nevertheless burdensome.

The Troubles of a Patriot

The disclosures that have been made with reference to the profits which Mr. Heney has derived from the practice of law in the interest of the dear pee-pul have in a measure diminished the verisimilitude of his representations touching his resemblance to Patrick Henry, George Washington and Abraham Lincoln. Very little pecuniary profit did those gentlemen derive from their patriotism. As to Washington it is true that he was under suspicion at one time, but he was never called upon to explain any financial transaction, and it has never been charged that his office expenses were paid by the British government at the time that the Jay treaty was under consideration. As a matter of fact Mr. Heney has been more unfortunate than almost any American patriot of whom I have any knowledge. At this moment there is a possibility of criminal charges growing out of his relations with Mr. Spreckels, and there are learned attorneys of the opinion that there is abundant evidence of bribery to be found in that portion of the record in the Calhoun case which deals with the financial transactions between the backer of the prosecution and the chief instrument thereof. In addition to his other troubles Mr. Heney has had heaped upon him the censure of the jurors whose judgment he was but recently trying to sway. The speech that the Boughten Bulletin pronounced eloquent has been characterized by the jurors as a political harangue. The Calhoun case has very seriously impaired what reputation Mr. Heney enjoyed as a lawyer, and altogether his lot is a most unhappy one.

An Insult Incarnate

Among other pleasant things I am particularly pleased with the outspoken resentment of the Calhoun jury against the espionage that was placed upon them by the prosecution. Juror Dixon's comparison of Korngold and the Burns gumshoe men to rats, and his demand that there shall be a presumption of honesty as well as a presumption of innocence, appeals to me with peculiar force because I am myself strongly imbued with prejudice against the "rats" and have insisted throughout the trial of this case that the precautions taken to insure the honesty of the jury were as insulting to the American citizenship and personal integrity of the jurors as such precautions would have been regarded by Judge Lawlor if they had been imposed on him instead of Juror Dixon or Juror Gillespie or any of the other jurors. Judge Lawlor would certainly have revolted if "Rat" Korngold had been set to watch him, and I am sure that if Heney or Burns had put any of their thugs and gumshoe men on his trail during the trial as they put these spies on the trail of everybody else, somebody would have been sent to jail for contempt of court. Yet I fail to see wherein Judge Lawlor is any better or more presumably honest than Juror Dixon, Juror Gillespie, Juror Symington or any of the other jurors in this case. As for this fellow Korngold he is an insult in himself; his very presence is a contamination. He testified that he had been "a consular detective in Shanghai," whatever that may be; but I suspect that it is more likely that he was a capper for a sing-song house in the Foochow Road. A cause must be desperate indeed when it is deemed necessary to employ such miserable wretches as Korngold to bolster it by their services and indorsement under oath—a mere formality of the law when applied to Korngold and the Burns bunch of gumshoe men, for nobody, not even Heney himself would believe them on their oaths. I am glad, therefore, that Juror Dixon has afforded me this opportunity to express by own opinion concerning the Burns outfit and the dirty work in which they have been employed by Rudolph Spreckels, James D. Phelan and Francis J. Heney.

It All Depends!

The desirability from the standpoint of the prosecution of putting an end to the deliberations of a jury that stands ten for conviction and two for acquittal is illustrated by a story that was told by a monologist recently at the Orpheum. The story is about an Irishman who refereed a prize-fight between one of his countrymen and a colored man. Early in the fight the Irish pugilist was knocked down, and the referee performed the duty devolved upon him in a manner that was far from prejudicial to his countryman's interests. "One," he shouted, and then he gave the man on the floor a gentle kick and urged him to get up. "Two," he counted, and administered another gentle rebuke at the same time admonishing the prostrate pugilist that time was fleeting. "Three!" Another kick and a few words of advice. In the course of time the Irishman leisurely arose and presently knocked down the colored man. Quick as a flash the referee thus: One and four are five and five makes ten—you're out." As Judge Lawlor is reputed to have a sense of humor he will probably appreciate this story. As to Mr. Calhoun, a man of infinite forbearance who has been clinging with sublime tenacity to a sentimental regard for the institutions of his country, I hear that his sense of humor is petering out.

"Tell me honestly what you think of my musical talent."
"Well, if you'll promise not to be offended—"
"Why, of course not—but never mind; let's talk of something else."

Collins in Stripes

George D. Collins, in some respects one of the shrewdest lawyers that this State has ever produced, is in stripes at San Quentin, picking jute with the gang. "That little tent of blue which prisoners call the sky" is the only glimpse of the outer world that is vouchsafed him—a man who could have gone to almost any position had be been possessed of moral scruples even in slight proportion to his legal ability. In the bitter fight that he has made for four years to escape the prison bars, in the abuse that has been heaped upon him by the daily papers—themselves so moral—the fact has to a large extent been lost sight of that Collins is a man of unusually brilliant attainments. Judge J. J. de Haven said of him once, "I never saw a man who could so skillfully split a hair from southeast to northwest. He was a wizard. What a pity"—and the kindly old judge forbore to say what was the pity. But the bench and bar all knew it. They all knew that when Collins was before the bar defending a criminal or urging the claims of a client, he had no scruples. It is told of him that he has deliberately misquoted a public document that he pretended to read to the court.

The Moral Press

With all this, Collins was a brilliant man. Few had his knowledge of international treaty law and constitutional law. Judges listened with profound attention to his pleadings, for there was much in them to be learned. They listened, too, because Collins was an orator—an impetuously eloquent speaker who could almost enthuse a Federal judge—and that's a whole lot. He had a satirical, rasping tongue that was hard to combat. And he was a master of technicalities, otherwise he could not have made the fight in which he has just been defeated. For more than three years, since his conviction and sentence of fourteen years for perjury, he has appealed his case to every court, to some of them twice, constantly bringing up new and surprising quibbles, forever astonishing people who thought that at last he had reached the end of his rope. And even when he went to San Quentin last week, he donned stripes cherishing a last forlorn hope—that Governor Gillett would sign the petition for pardon that he has presented. I never could understand why the newspapers were so venomous in their attacks on Collins during his trials. He had always been a good friend of the reporters, willing at any time to go out of his way to give them a story. As soon as he was arrested the dailies began thwacking him lustily, and through all his troubles they persisted. Of course, being great moral engines, it was clearly the duty of the dailies to lambaste a man arrested for bigamy. And now that Collins has gone, and as they are still conservers of public morals, they might turn the engines of their wrath on some of the other attorneys of San Francisco—on the Bar Association as a body, for that matter. It has never made any move to clear the profession of the shysters that cling to it. I find no word to say in defense of Collins—but I will say that he has merely been more unfortunate than some others of his profession in San Francisco.

He Loves Harmony

School Superintendent Roncovieri has discovered that many of our grammar school teachers are incompetent to teach grammar. Mr. Roncovieri being a musician is a lover of harmony, and discordant parts of speech jar on his sensibilities. Mr. Roncovieri, by the way, illustrates the advantage of having a superintendent of schools that is not a pedagogue. He is the most efficient superintendent of schools that we have had in many years. A relic of the Schmitz administration, he survived it without a stain on his personal character, and he has performed his duties with enthusiasm and with marked success. In constituting himself the champion of our poor, neglected grammar he proves that he appreciates the importance of a study which, though it ought to be held in high esteem, has received some pretty rough treatment at the hands of illiterate schoolmasters. One of the principal advantages of an intimate acquaintance with grammar is that it discourages people with crotchets who attach undue importance to insignificant questions out of incapacity to take an interest in exalted themes. Persons who are qualified to discuss the rules of grammar are never to be found among the grammar-sharps. Men of literary tastes and habits are as disinclined to point out violations of the rules of grammar as well-bred people are to discuss the rules of etiquette. The most intolerable of bores is the man with crotchets respecting the use of words and phrases, who labors under the delusion that fixed standards of purity which apply to dead languages should also apply to a living language. Experts in the philosophy of language know that expressions which sometimes appear to be ungrammatical are susceptible of being squared with the rules of grammar, and that grammatical sentences are sometimes almost unintelligible. The futility of narrow criticism is evident from the fact that good usage is continually legalizing expressions that are not from the well of English pure and undefiled, and proscribing expressions that once had the approval of cultured writers. Usage cannot be gainsaid unless it be in conflict with the very principles of language.

The Reason Why

It is not hard to account for the ignorance that prevails among grammar school teachers with respect to grammar. Many of them were at school about the time that the obsolete school-teacher was superseded by the "educator." Hardly had the educator been installed when he made the discovery that syntax and spelling were beyond the mental capacity of the young, and that pupils were wasting their time attempting the impossible, wallowing the while in ignorance of art, nature study and Battenburg embroidery. To improve the state of affairs specialists were employed to teach the exquisite essentials and the three r's were consigned to the limbo of things to be forgotten. "Language lessons" were substituted for grammar, but even these did not receive half so much attention as was given to the designing of Christmas cards and other fads that were fostered with great zeal. About the same time athletics won recognition equal to that which had been bestowed on scholarship, and the spelling bee and parsing match, which had served to stimulate rivalry between schools, were abandoned for track meets and other muscle producers. The result, which now staggers Superintendent Roncovieri, is precisely what might have been expected. Our whole educational system is but a series of painted shadows, and the teachers themselves who are the products of it are but lame dancing masters. Many of them are versed in the rules of bridge but the correlation of conjunctions, the agreement of pronouns and antecedents, and the correspondence of subjects and predicates are matters beyond their comprehension.

The New Cliff House

Once more the sound of revelry will mingle with the hoarse barking of the basking seals out on the cliff that towers above the roaring breakers. There will joy soon again be unconfined. The finishing touches have been put on the new Cliff House, and the doors will soon be thrown open to the public, marking another historic event in the upbuilding of new San Francisco. If you haven't reserved a table for the opening night, number yourself among the also-rans. It will be a gala event, this formal dedication of a new house of mirth to the pleasure of the devotees of the joy of living of this laughter-loving city. The new Cliff House is to be somewhat different from its predecessors. It is under the management of those two enterprising Olympians "Jack" Tait and George Jones, and they appreciate the fact that in the Cliff House San Francisco has a unique resort that is identified with the sprightliest traditions of the city, and that is famous the world over. Their conception of its potentialities as a resort is set forth in a beautiful booklet which will be given wide circulation. Here are some of their observations: "The Ocean Beach and the Cliff House have long been recognized as the mecca for travelers, and those visitors who have neglected the opportunity to gaze out over the tumbling surges of the Pacific and view the clumsy sea lions scrambling over the precipitous rocks within a stone's throw of the shore, have omitted an ex-

Hunting the Terrible Bongo

A. J. Lambert, "special correspondent of the San Francisco Examiner, who accompanied the Roosevelt expedition to Africa," and was left at his post in Nairobi, about 200 miles in the rear of the "expedition," has now left his post in Nairobi and writing from London, which is a far cry from Africa, tells us that Colonel Roosevelt has reduced his sea-going flabbiness "to a sturdy hardness and the equatorial sun has tanned him almost to a bronze." As Correspondent Lambert has not been permitted to set eyes on Colonel Roosevelt since he plunged into the wild farming region of Kapiti, we are at liberty to put him, the newspaperman, in the nature-faking class eligible to membership in the Ananias Club. It is presumed, of course, that Bwanno Tumbo is less 'flabby" than he was before he acquired that appellation, because he has been trekking around after the fleet-hoofed springbok and chasing after the "hand-fed" lion that fleeth even when no man pursues; and it does not require extraordinary prescience to guess that "equatorial sun" has tanned him almost to a bronze. But the information that Correspondent Lambert cables by the longest leased wire in the world is hearsay from the lips of daily couriers out of the almost impenetrable jungle that hides Colonel Roosevelt from our observation. Perhaps the couriers are lying; who, except Colonel Roosevelt, knows? Perhaps our beloved ex-president is still flabby; perhaps he is not as tanned as the correspondent paints him. Ever since these nature fakers have been discredited by the Great Authority, we have lost confidence in even their most trivial statements. More important, however, than the alleged physical condition of the Mighty Hunter, is the complaint which Correspondent Lambert makes on behalf of the biggest man in Africa. He says that the lion hunter is "satiated with his overwhelming success"; that "his bag is enormous, but is too good a sportsman not to appreciate that his experience is not altogether the real thing in big game hunting"; and that the overzealous efforts of his hosts, African Farmer Pease and African Farmer McMillan, to make the hunt successful have resulted in "making the shooting so easy as to become almost amusing." That is precisely what I said in these columns about four weeks ago. In truth I went much farther than does Correspondent Lambert in description of the amusing episode now being shot into the history of Africa by Colonel Roosevelt. We don't have to accompany the Mighty Hunter into the heart of the Kapiti region to realize that the Roosevelt expedition is one of the most amusing things that has happened to Africa since the pharaoh hunted the Israelites out of Egypt. It is particularly amusing because Roosevelt takes it so seriously. There is reason to believe that he actually thinks he is hunting big game in the common meaning of the term—that he is incurring great risk from lions and rhinoceroses and hippopotami. Every schoolboy who is familiar with the habit of the African beast of prey knows that there is no more risk hunting these animals than there is hunting coyotes and bobcats. The lion is an arrant four flusher, the rhinoceros is a false alarm and the hippopotamus is a boob. To shoot a lion on the jump is to hit him in the maneless end of him; to plug a rhinoceros is to take cruel advantage of a defenseless brute; and to kill a hippopotamus is like butchering your neighbor's cow. But there is one really dangerous beast on the African veldts and lurking in the African jungle, and Correspondent Lambert tells us that Hunter Roosevelt has finally determined to stalk this African terror to his lair. The "elusive nocturnal bongo" is a fierce and truculent beast not to be despised by the mightiest of hunters and more to be dreaded than all the lions that range the plain or sneak into the forest. The bongo is the king of African animals and not one has ever been killed by a white man. It is a devourer of men and a monster of incredibly hideous aspect. Nobody knows just what a bongo is, for the zoologists who have tried to classify it have never lived to tell the tale. It is thought to be near akin to the fearsome jabberwock, however, and distantly related to the boojum that vanishes away. If Colonel Roosevelt survives an encounter with the fatal bongo his fame as a mighty hunter will be assured for all time. And if he is devoured by the voracious creature he will still be worthy of our highest esteem as a man of courage who perished in the cause of science while in the performance of his duty. The Wanderobo natives have a beautiful and suggestive tradition which one of their poets has whacked into a poem of unusual merit, the first verse of which is translated as follows:

"There was a great man on the Congo,
Who hunted all night for a bongo.
He found what he wanted
And with valor undaunted
He mixed himself up with that Bongo."

The opening of the new Techau Tavern at Eddy and Powell streets, which is scheduled for July 1st, promises to be as genuine an event as anything that has occurred in connection with the down-town movement. Its president, Carleton Wall, with A. C. Morrison, the manager, made a tour of all the eastern cities with a view to patterning after the best, and the result surpasses any expectations save their own. The interior is Spanish Rennaisance, and all the equipment of silver, glass, linen and furniture has been specially designed and made to order. The banquet room has facilities for serving a hundred and fifty persons, with kitchen, hat and cloak room, ladies' parlor and dressing rooms, all in an apartment by itself. The mezzanine floor consists of dining booths opening out and facing the cafe in an arrangement resembling that of private boxes at a theatre. For the opening night a special dinner has been prepared, and the entire evening will be devoted to the entertainment of guests and a big family gathering. Vocal and instrumental music will enliven the evening, the novelty and special attraction being Rigo, the Gypsy, who won world wide fame for himself in his conquest of the Princess Chimay. He will lead his Gypsy orchestra.

THE WHANGO TREE

The woggly bird sat on the whango tree,
  Nooping the rinkum corn,
And graper and graper, alas! grew he,
  And cursed the day he was born.
His crute was clum and his voice was rum,
  As curiously thus sang he,
"Oh, would I'd been rammed and eternally clammed E'er I perched on this whango tree."

Now the whango tree had a bubbly thorn,
  As sharp as a nootie's bill,
And it stuck in the woggly bird's umptum, lorn
  And weepadge, the smart did thrill.
He fumbled and cursed, but that wasn't the worst,
  For he couldn't at all get free,
And he cried "I am gammed, and injustibly nammed
  On the luggardly whango tree."

And there he sits still, with no worm in his bill,
  Nor no guggledom in his nest;
He is hungry and bare, and gobliddered with care,
  And his grabbles give him no rest;
He is weary and glore and his tugmut is soar,
  And nothing to nob has he,
As he chirps, "I am blammed and corruptily jammed,
  In this cuggerdom whango tree."

MATERNITY

Mother of God, what is thy thought to-night,
  As his dear, patient face looks down to thee,
  Moist with the dews of unguessed agony?
    Hast thou the prophet's ecstasy of sight,
To scan afar the world's noontide of light?
  Art thou rejoicing in the joy to be?
  Perchance, but oh that trembling minor key,
    The mother's heart still clamoring for its right—
"Give me my child, if all the world must die."
  And through the shadows of the scene of death
    Streams morning sunshine from the former years,
Upon thy breast the smiling babe doth lie,
  And all the happy days in Nazareth
    Break on thee through the blinding mist of tears.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks: Although prices were somewhat lower at the end of last week, the tone of the list was much improved. The usual week-end selling was not on a very large scale, indicating in part that the selling of the past few days has, to a very great extent, discounted the slight change in sentiment noticed in some quarters. The Atchison issues have been in active demand, with the buying attributed to foreign sources and some talk is heard of a probable increase in the dividend in the near future. The news from Washington is receiving more attention, but the contradictory cables in regard to the Steel listing in Paris was not receiving so much attention. The reaction has improved the position of the market and the buying on the decline is of a good nature. It is not thought that the recommendation for a tax on corporations will greatly influence the market and the street seems to have become reconciled to a longer session of Congress than at first anticipated. Crop conditions continue very favorable and railroad earnings are showing a big gain over last year. As long as money remains so cheap there is very little chance of more than a natural reaction of a point or two.

Cotton: Talk of short time in England and the near approach of notice day for July contracts served to hold speculation in check the past week, but although the market was at all times very dull and narrow prices were well maintained. Weather news with the exception of unusually high temperatures at some points in Texas was more favorable. Spinners taking continue on a large scale and therefore short time is not being seriously taken by the trade, who are inclined to look upon the matter as being a move on the part of those who are short of cotton, and want to cover. Firm spot markets are reflecting the early exhaustion of supplies at the south and it is evident that competition for the remants of the old crop will become quite keen before new crop cotton is available. Fluctuations are expected to be confined to a narrow range until after the Government Report on Condition to be issued on July 2nd is out of the way and any volume of selling might cause a slight depression, but we think that declines will be very limited and temporary in character and purchases made on all such occasions should yield handsome profits in the near future, as conditions favor the establishment of a much higher basis of values.

Wheat: It developed into a bearish situation in wheat for the week. The most decided break in prices came on Saturday when lowest quotations were made. From high point Monday to low point Saturday, the July price covered a range of five cents, closing 4¼ cents net loss. Declines for the other months were 3½ cents for September and three cents for December. Bullish statistics early in the week showed a decrease of over one-half million bushels in Chicago stocks, a decrease of over 2,000,000 bushels in the visible supply, fast decreasing stocks at Minneapolis, where large quantities of wheat are being taken out of the elevators for local mills and for shipment to country mills, and cash sales in one day as large as 180,000 bushels, all of which had little effect in giving the market support. Late in the week weather conditions over the entire winter wheat country were greatly improved, both for the early harvests and for maturing the crops in State further north. There was some selling of July against new crop offerings, there was general liquidation of that month and naturally short selling for all months as the bears found the support in the market wanting. Crop experts are still fighting over the Kansas harvest promised. John Inglis and B. W. Snow, as well as Rollin E. Smith of the Commercial Post at Memphis, have all given a great deal of time to examination of the Kansas crop and they all agree that the yield at best would be under 70,000,000 bushels. The week closed with the local trade heavily short on the break. While July wheat may be forced down nearer the level of the September, we notice that the late months are beginning to show stubbornness at present levels and anything like bullish news in the shape of bad weather or poor yields from early harvest on the Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, Missouri and Southern Kansas would create a buying flurry in quick order. The bull market may be delayed until the trade discovers that the movement from the new crop is slow or disappointingly small.

An Engagement Rumored

The gossips at the Hotel Rafael are on the tiptoe of expectancy with their ears open for the announcement of an engagement of a young woman of international renown. For be it known that the tennis court does not hold the interest of May Sutton to the exclusion of all else. Occasionally she finds time for sentimental diversion in the game of hearts, and rumor has it that the graceful tennis champion has consented to gladden the heart of a man from Mexico, a young man, a graduate of Harvard and the son of a banker. He is not a native of Mexico. He is a good American citizen and at present he is living at the Hotel Rafael and spending a good deal of time in the company of Miss May Sutton.

The Rumor Will Not Down

The hushed rumor of an approaching marriage between Susie Darneal Paxton and William H. Talbot as soon as the law allowed was revived last week when Mrs. Paxton and Mr. Talbot appeared together in a box at the Valencia on the opening night of Mrs. Fiske's engagement. On this occasion Mrs. Paxton was attired in a handsome gown of black lace and wore a large black hat with waving plumes which gave her a marked resemblance to Ethel Barrymore, especially in that scene where Miss Barrymore wears a hat which is the counterpart of the one worn by Mrs. Paxton on Monday night. Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Talbot were also members of the box party.

The New "Princess" Alice

It is natural that we should hear very much less about Mrs. Nicholas Longworth in these days than we did about the "Princess Alice" in the time of her heydey, though as the wife of the representative from Ohio she is no inconspicuous figure in the social life of Washington. A correspondent writes me that she has dropped the hoydenish manner which characterized her in the days of her White House belleship and kept two continents in gossip, and has replaced it with something approaching staid dignity, which, however, she is quite capable of laying aside on occasion. The devotion of "Nick" Longworth is as manifest today as in the days of courtship, and one custom which began before marriage has not been relinquished. Every morning Mrs. Longworth drives her husband to the Capitol. The trips used to be made in the White House brougham accompanied by the liveried servants, but now they are made in the Longworth auto, piloted by Mrs. Longworth. Apparently there is no danger of custom staling the pleasure, for they laugh and chat like two children out for a lark.

Enjoys the Joshing at Papa's Expense

One commendable quality of the ex-president daughter, says my correspondent, is her loyalty to her friends. She is one of the most conspicuous patronesses of Mrs. Taft's new social boulevard, the Potomac Speedway, and has never missed once driving down to hear the band concert since the driveway was dedicated by society. Sometimes she has with her in her runabout one of her girl friends and again some man friend of her own or her husband's. Her friendship with the Tafts has never dimmed. It was founded on something more substantial than political accident, and the Tafts are genuinely fond of the young woman much of whose courtship was carried on during the trip which she made to the Orient under their chaperonage. Mrs. Longworth has abated none of the interest which she took in politics, and is a frequent visitor to the Capitol to hear the tariff debates. She seems to enjoy the burlesques on her father's African hunting trip and the jokes which are founded on it even more than the rest of the family do. Manchu, the Japanese spaniel which she brought back from the Orient, named after the ship on which she sailed, the Manchuria, is still a favored member of the household. Mrs. Longworth entertains extensively at her Washington home, though she draws the line at the promiscous "open house and welcome everybody" which has made the life of the congressional hostess such a burden.

A Will Contest in Society

Will contests are such a matter of course in these days that the most sensational intimations elicit nothing more than a shrug and a perfunctory "of course," but the attack made by James A. Hogue on the testamentary disposition of the fortune of his late brother, William M. Hogue, has caused something of a flutter in society circles. Undue influence on the part of Dr. Charles Ellingwood and his sister-in-law, Mrs. Kate E. McDowell Cunningham, is alleged as the reason why the octogenarian, whose mind was somewhat affected by his age, was induced to leave nearly half his estate to the Ellingwoods and Cunninghams and their descendants, who, though related to each other, were not akin to the testator. William Hoag acquired his wealth through transactions in real estate. He belonged to a prominent southern family whose name is said to have been originally Hogg, and one of the three brothers, Captain Egerton Hogg, never changed his patronymic to conform to the tastes of the others, but on the contrary, had neither patience nor sympathy with the "improvement." Whenever occasion called for an explanation, he tersely gave it in few words: "They are Hoag but I am Hogg." Captain Egerton Hogg will be remembered by old-timers as the participator in one of the few war-time episodes of the Pacific Coast. He happened to be on this side of the continent when he was arrested as a privateer and with two or three other rebels, was brought to San Francisco, paraded through the public streets in chains, tried, convicted and sentenced to death, but the court at Washington commuted the sentence to imprisonment on Alcatraz, where, while languishing in confinement, he contracted a cold which eventually hastened his death. Mrs. Cunningham, the beneficiary of the will of William Hoag, is the wife of Robert Baron Cunningham, whose father was the late Commodore Cunningham, U. S. N., and whose family is more or less connected with the navy. The Cunninghams have not lived together for some years, Mr. Cunningham making his home in Mexico, his appearance a few years ago at the marriage of his daughter, Charlotte, to Captain Percy Meyers Kessler, of the artillery, being his first home-coming for many years. That wedding was one of the most elaborate ever given in the city. The trousseau was reported to have cost ten thousand dollars, and the reception, at the Clay street home, was on the most lavish scale. "Uncle William" (Mr. Hoag), who had long resided in apartments in the hotel at the corner of Leavenworth and Sutter streets, one of the many valuable pieces of real estate which he owned, was making his home at the Cunningham residence, and the wedding, with all its accessories, was said to have been his open-handed gift. The eldest child of the Kesslers was named William Hoag Kessler, and received as a baptismal gift the deeds of some valuable property. Now it is asserted that all this generosity was not spontaneous, but the result of hypnotic influence, and the will itself signed only to secure peace, and all sorts of insinuations and dark revelations are promised when the case goes before the court. Charlotte Cunningham and her cousin, Charlotte Ellingwood, now Mrs. Robert Greer, were two of the most popular debutantes of their season, and as Mrs. Kessler, Charlotte Cunningham is just as great a favorite in army circles about New York, where Captain Cunningham is stationed.

The O'Brien-Peart Wedding

The wedding of Miss Loretto O'Brien, daughter of J. H. O'Brien, and Hartley F. Peart, which took place at the residence of the bride's parents, 738 Hayes street, on Wednesday evening, was one of the brilliant social events of the summer season. The bride presented a lovely picture in white liberty satin and rare and beautiful lace, with the traditional veil and wreath of orange blossoms. She was given by her father into the keeping of the groom, Rev. Father McQuade officiating. The maid of honor, Miss Kathryn O'Brien, was in white chiffon over blue satin, and the two other assistants, Miss Genevieve O'Brien and Miss Kathryn Gilleran, a cousin of the bride, were gowned alike in blue Messaline. All the attendants carried shower bouquets of Cecil Breuner roses, and the bridal party assembled under a canopy of ferns and pink flowers. The groom was attended by his brother, Norman Peart. About one hundred and fifty guests were invited to witness the ceremony and attend the reception which followed and which proved a most delightful affair.

An Engagement in Sausalito

The announcement of the engagement of Miss Eleanor Dixon and Richard Noel-Bond of Sausalito, will come as a pleasing surprise to their many friends. Miss Dixon belongs to what we like to designate as the "old-time Southern aristocracy." Her father, the late Harry St. John Dixon, was a son of Judge Dixon of Mississippi, while her mother, who died recently, was Miss Constance Maynard, daughter of Lafayette Maynard and sister of George and John Maynard, all likewise deceased. Misses Eva and Sallie Maynard and Mrs. William M. Gunn and Mrs. Stanton are cousins of the prospective bride, and Mrs. Arthur Chambers and Mrs. Duncan of Seattle (Rebecca and Constance Dixon) are her sisters. Maynard Dixon, the well-known artist, is her elder brother, and there is a young brother, Harry. Mr. Bond is an Englishman, a widower with one half-grown daughter. The wedding will take place in about six weeks and unless plans are changed, they will leave for England almost immediately, where they will make their future residence. The Dixons came up from Fresno to reside in Sausalito a comparatively short time ago.

A Sensible Society Girl

When the news of the engagement of Dolly Cushing and Jim Jenkins was made public there came first the flood of congratulations, and then society took to regretting that the engagement must be inevitably such a long one, for, of course, after the modern style, it is taken for granted that a bride must begin her domestic establishment on at least as lavish a scale as her mother leaves off. But Dolly Cushing is a level-headed and original girl. She is willing to begin anywhere as long as they can begin together, and has set herself to work in earnest to qualify for the position of house mistress. She is taking cooking lessons—not the usual chafing-dish stunts in evening gown, where a few mistakes more or less do not matter when "it's all such fun," nor fudge over the gas range, but real, substantial dishes guaranteed to be both nourishing and appetizing. Every day, no matter what pleasure calls, she goes into the kitchen and prepares one dish for luncheon and one for dinner, and though she has practiced the art but a few weeks she is already proficient, for there is nothing like earnestness and a definite object in view to provide a stimulus for ambition. Instead of a date somewhere in the indefinite future, the Cushing-Jenkins wedding will take place in the late fall. One matron, with only sons to marry off has openly asserted her opinion that it is a great shame other engaged girls have not shown the same practical interest in their future households, and that if they would, the number of unhappy marriages would be reduced to one-half. As Dolly Cushing has always been a leader in her set it will surprise nobody if the others follow her example, and there are rumors of two more engagements soon to be reported from San Rafael. It is a modern idea that ladyhood is altogether concerned with pleasures, and a return to the old idea where the chatelaine could, if necessary, take hold of any piece of work with her own hands, and was thereby qualified to direct and instruct her underlings, would be no bad condition.

She Has Suitors Galore

Princess Kawananakoa, whose royally titled husband died here in San Francisco last year, is now at her Honolulu home but is preparing to return to the coast next month, and coupled with this news comes a rumor that when she does so it will be on matrimony bent. When the princess was here two months ago she made no secret of the fact that she was contemplating another marriage and was only deferring the occasion out of indecision, for she had a wealth of suitors from which to choose and could not determine which of the three prominent San Franciscans she would eventually accept. Princess Kawananakoa is a very fascinating woman, and in Washington and New York she has been royally feted and entertained. She is less well known in San Francisco but if she comes here to make her home no doubt she will prove as great a social favorite as she is in the east and abroad, where she was educated.

In the Social Spotlight

Mrs. Ernest Dichman, accompanied by her youngest son, Ernest, left during the week for Europe. They will go directly to Ireland where Mrs. Dichman, who was Bessie Grattan, is needed in connection with the settlement of the Grattan estate. Then they will proceed to tour the continent, remaining abroad for a considerable time. It was this necessity for the presence of Mrs. Dichman in Ireland which led to the hastening forward of the marriage of Miss Bessie Dichman and Lieutenant Thurman Harrison Bane. The Banes are now settled in Sequoia Park, that is, as far as an army officer ever is settled anywhere, for in September they are scheduled to leave for the Philippines. The Dichman home at Edgehill, Napa county, is one of the show places of its vicinity.

The entertainment for the Hill Farm Sanitarium held at Ross Valley last Saturday was a grand financial success. Mrs. George Pincard and Mrs. T. Beale managed the tea and flower table; Mrs. Berry, Mrs. Du Bois and Miss Steward had the "surprise" table for adults, and little Miss Boyd and Miss Flora Miller, in Normandy costumes, took charge of the grab bag, while Les-

A party of tourists from Colorado Springs, which included Dr. Alfred A. Blackman, E. C. Atwater, Helen Craig, Mrs. A. A. Blackman, C. R. Blackman, Miss Ida Blackman and Mrs. K. L. Hale, making a leisurely trip to points of interest, all registered at the Fairmont.

The marriage of Mrs. Antoinette R. Cockrill and Hamilton Guy Howard, which took place in St. Louis on June 12, will interest society on this coast since the Howards will make their future home in California. It was during the winter of 1907-8 that Mr. Howard met his future bride, while she was on a visit to her sister, Mrs. Charles D. Rockwood, at Pacific Grove. Both have been great travelers, and there are few corners of the globe which they do not know. Mr. Howard, a son of the late Senator Jacob N. Howard, and a cousin of President Taft, is well known in the social, political and financial world through his long residence in Washington, D. C. The Howards are on their way to San Diego, where they will make their home.

Mr. and Mrs. Archibaldo Burns of Chihuahua, Mexico, are at the Fairmont. Senor Burns is one of the leading business men of his city and has connection with large mining and development works in that section. The Burns' are well known both socially and commercially throughout Mexico. They will remain in the city for some time.

Dr. and Mrs. James Whitney, whose charming affairs at the Palace Hotel were part of the society life of San Francisco for so many years have permanent quarters at the Hotel Vendome.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert C. Rankin, Miss Annette Rankin and Miss Charlotte Wellington of London, England, are registered at the Alexandra Hotel, Los Angeles. Captain C. F. Lowerby of the Royal Navy, attached to the British Embassy at Washington, is also at the hotel for a short stay.

Members of the Burlingame and El Cerito country clubs will be out in force at the tennis courts of the Peninsula Hotel this afternoon and tomorrow when the tennis championship of San Mateo county in men's and women's singles will be contested for. For the past three months, in fact, ever since the close of the polo season, the athletically inclined have been making use of the courts, both public and private, at every opportunity, and a brisk contest is assured. A large entry list has been received by the tournament committee, Arthur Green and L. E. Fuller. Thomas A. Driscoll is the present holder of the men's title and bids fair to retain both it and the hotel cup with a successful defence of his honor. The championship of the women's singles will be contested for the first time this year, and the best players of the Menlo Golf and Country Club, Burilngame and El Cerito are all interested.

Miss Lydia Gibbons is at the Fairmont visiting her sister, Mrs. J. Charles Green. Miss Gibbons has just returned from Honolulu, where the announcement of her engagement to Mr. Shafter was made public. Since her return she has been the motif of a number of pleasant entertainments.

T. A. Sperry, president of the Crawford National Bank of New York, accompanied by Mrs. Sperry and their son and daughter, have been at the Alexandra Hotel, Los Angeles, for a week. Miss Sperry's sixteenth birthday was celebrated by an elaborate luncheon.

Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Coryell of Menlo Park are at the Fairmont.

Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Gallois and Miss Jenne Gallois have returned to their apartments at the Fairmont, after a visit of two weeks in Southern California.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Van Irgift and J. M. Van Irgift of Philadelphia, who are on a round the world tour, will stop in Los Angeles while they complete preparations for the next stage of their voyage.

A large party of friends assembled at the ferry on Sunday morning to bid farewell to Mrs. Frank Finley and her young son when she left for her new home in Boston. Before her departure she was the recipient of many social demonstrations. The tea given by her mother, Mrs. H. Clay Miller, and her sister-in-law, Mrs. H. Clay Miller, Jr., was one of the most elaborate of the season. Lavender, the favorite color of the guest of honor, prevailed, and the lavender costume which she wore, set off her dashing brunette beauty to the best advantage.

At the Van Ness

Marie Doro, the third of the great Frohman stars to appear in succession at the Van Ness Theatre, has quickly established herself as a favorite. There is about her and her play, "The Morals of Marcus," a freshness and lightness that fit well with the season of the year. One of Miss Doro's many assets is her personal charm. In the part of the little English runaway from the Turkish harem she is wayward and winsome. She seems but a fragile little girl, and about her Carlotta there is a suggestion of the dryad, an elfin ingenuousness. With her big brown eyes, and her squirrel-like actions, she should make an admirable Babbie for "The Little Minister." As for W. J. Locke's comedy, its chief value is that it is a pretty story told in a pretty way. The conversion of the bookish Sir Marcus from the kindly cynic to the lover is handled in a quietly humorous fashion, and suggests David Copperfield and his child wife, with the difference that Carlotta's education has been Oriental. Many of the members of the company deserve individual praise. Edwin Arden is particularly well suited to the part of Sir Marcus. His quiet style and address fill the requirements of the role, while the sarcasms of Sir Marcus fall naturally from his lips. Marie Wainwright as Mrs. Ordeyne, a distant relative, cleverly portrays the refined woman of fashion with designs for her daughter, and though Fred Eric, as Hamdi Effendi, the Turkish stepfather of Carlotta, appears in only one scene, he displays the alternate obsequiousness and hauteur of the wealthy Turk in a manner that centers the attention of the audience upon him. Marion Abbott as Antoinette, plays the French maid with a spontaniety that wins her warm applause, and the fifteen other members of the cast acquit themselves in a manner that is typical of a Frohman company.

At the American

The first two weeks of "The Blue Mouse" made a record-breaking run for the American Theatre, and with reservations in heavy demand for the coming seven days, the Clyde Fitch farce which has taken San Francisco by storm bids fair to sustain an unprecedented engagement. This much discussed and badly maligned comedy, which has nothing in it to offend the finer sensibilities, scored spontaneously with local playgoers, and perhaps no offering of its kind has jumped so into popular favor in years. "The Blue Mouse" is filled with situations which, though they leave no lasting impression on the mind, will give the clean-witted theatregoer a great deal of amusement. The only ones who can find a serious objection to the version presented by the Shubert company is the man who has something in his life which he would rather his family and the world at large did not know. To him the comedy may appear too suggestive of a situation which everyone admits exists but few care to discuss. Miss Ryan, the "Blue Mouse," is an actress of more than ordinary ability and her interpretation of the role is such as to win the praise of every lover of dramatic art. Wilton Taylor as the gullible old railroad president, and Geoffrey Stein as his promotion seeking secretary, could not be improved upon. It is a tame blue mouse that is fooling full houses every night at the American Theatre.

At the Alcazar

A double bill is announced for the coming week in the Alcazar. Wycherley's three-act comedy, "A Country Girl," will be preceded by "Journey's End in Lovers' Meeting," a playlet by the late John Oliver Hobbs which has never been presented in San Francisco. Florence Roberts and Thurlow Bergen will appear in both plays. "A Country Girl" has been selected to follow "Du Barry" because it will remind this city's playgoers that Miss Roberts is no less magnetic as a comedienne than in emotional work. She will have the role of Peggy Thrift, a rustic heiress who is less of a fool than she looks and acts. By her clever interpretation of the somewhat complex character Miss Roberts made one of her biggest hits in the old Alcazar. "Journey's End in Lovers' Meeting" has been presented in this country only by Ellen Terry. The Eastern critics pronounced it a masterpiece of short-play writing. It tells the story of a society woman who is estranged from her husband but continues to live in the house with him. On returning home from a ball she is followed by an old admirer on the pretext of restoring some article she dropped during the dance, and while he is with her the husband returns. She conceals the admirer in the library, and the delightfulness of the play consists of the manner in which he is got rid of and a reconciliation between husband and wife is effected. While the theme itself may not be new, its treatment is decidedly novel, and as the wife Miss Roberts will be afforded opportunity to display her art in a role that has been a favorite of Miss Terry and the Eastern public.

"The Merry Widow" on the Glorious Fourth

"The Merry Widow" will be seen for the first time in San Francisco on Sunday night, July 4th, when it will be staged on an elaborate scale at the Van Ness by Henry W. Savage. Over a hundred people will appear in the production, and with its wealth of music, scenery, and light effects it should create a furore. The costumes are all genuinely Parisian, as well as the wonderful hats, now as famous in the millinery world as the score is in the musical. Among the principals will be Mabel Wilby George Dameral, Anna Bussert, Oscar Figman, Georgena Leary and Thomas Leary. Thousands of mail, telephone and telegraph orders have reached the box office since the announcement was made, asking for reservations in advance of the regular sale. All orders have been numbered and will be filled next Thursday in the order of their reception, after the line at the box office is supplied.

"Three Weeks" on the Stage

A distinguished writer once said: "There is no joy but bitter tears will come to cast it like a fallen angel forth," and this is truly illustrated in Elinor Glyn's dramatization of her story, "Three Weeks," which will be presented under the same title in the near future at the American Theatre by a company of distinguished players headed by the great emotional actress Miss Beryl Hope and Mr. Henry C. Browne. The unhappy queen of Sardalia paid the inevitable price for her short-lived happiness. Mrs. Glyn has written a book that, despite the hot, adverse criticism which it has received, will open a line of thought to men and women which must, in some near future time, work great good for the community. Contrary to expectations, she has made a love tragedy from the story that is full of human interest and yet has abundant action and dramatic force. One feature of the play which is not contained in the book shows the queen at home in Sardalia with the brute king, and serves to explain the motive for her conduct. Elaborate scenic effects and attention to detail will mark the persentation.

SYDNEY AYRES

The new leading man at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland

At the Orpheum

The program for next week indicates a continuance of the high standard of vaudeville for which this house is famous. Laddie Cliff, the celebrated English boy singer and comedian who scored such an instantaneous success in New York recently, will make his first appearance. No British entertainer who has come to this country has made such a hit as this seventeen-year-old lad, and the best part of it is that he is yet unspoiled by a triumph which would have turned the heads of older performers. He is as breezy, natural and amusing as when, unknown, he made his first bow in New York. His humor is more of the American than the British order, and his eccentric dancing, in which he appears to be unable to control his feet and his comical facial expression when singing his droll ditties always set the town to talking. "The Eight Original Madcaps," a fascinating aggregation of twirling, whirling, dancing wonders, is included in the bill, despite the fact that every manager in New York tried to entice them away from vaudeville after their remarkable success in "A Knight for a Day" at Wallack's, where they remained for a whole season. Max Witt's singing Colleens, a quartette, presents an agreeable novelty in "Songs of the Old and New World," and make a strong appeal to the audience in such melodies as "Come Back to Erin," "The Little Colleen I Love," "The Glow Worm," Castles in the Air," and "When I Marry You." Ollie Young and Brothers have a new novelty, for in addition to the hoop-rolling, which Ollie Young was first to introduce to the stage, they will give an interesting exhibition of diabolo playing and boomerang throwing. Next week will be the last of James Thornton, The Camille Trio, Gladys Clarke, Henry Bergman and the "Futurity Winner" with its thrilling horse race. A novel and interesting series of motion pictures completes the program.

Liberty Company in "First Born"

The new company at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, the members of which created such a favorable impression during their initial appearances in "The Girl of the Golden West" this week, will have a chance to show their versatility in the production announced to follow the Belasco play. It is to be a bill made up of "The First Born," Francis Powers' well-known little Chinese drama, and "David Garrick," a comedy of the lighter order in which the famous actor of the eighteen century

MAX WITT'S SINGING COLLEENS

Who will begin an engagement next Sunday at the Orpheum is made the central figure. The combination of a tragedy worked out in the Chinatown of San Francisco before the fire and a comedy set in the picturesque eighteenth century has been found to be a delightful one, and should certainly provide an excellent week's diversion for across the bay playgoers. In "David Garrick," Sydney Ayres has the role of the "play-actor" of olden times, and in "The First Born" he will play Chan Wang to the Loey Tsing of Florence Oakley. Henry Shumer, Robert Harrison, William Wolbert, George Webster, Robert Lawler, Lillian Elliott and all the rest of the favorites will be seen in both pieces, and both will be given the complete and accurate scenic productions which have made Ye Liberty famous. "The Heart of Maryland" is in preparation for Fourth of July week.

Mrs. Fiske in Oakland

Mrs. Fiske will present "Salvation Nell" at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, next Monday evening, the management of that theatre having consented to lay off the entire stock company in order that the playgoers of Oakland and the surrounding towns may see this talented artist in her latest success. The engagement is limited to one night only, and the indications are that "Salvation Nell" will be greeted by a crowded house.

Grand Opera at the Princess

The Grand Opera Company at the Princess is proving a brilliant success and the unanimous verdict is that it is the best that has been heard here since the Conreid Metropolitan Grand Opera House Company. The repertoire for next week will be as follows: Monday and Thursday nights and Saturday matinee, "Rigoletto"; Tuesday, Friday and Sunday nights "Faust"; Wednesday matinee and Saturday night, "Carmen"; Wednesday night, "Il Trovatore." Great preparations are being made for the production of Mascagni's "Amico Fritz" which has never been given in America but has proved a tremendous hit in Europe.

Juvenile Prattle

A little seven-year-old Washingtonian, who is already wrestling with the intricacies of the English grammar, during a recent recitation was asked by his teacher: "Hawley, can you give the principal parts of the very 'to die'?" "Oh, yes," said Hawley, his face lighted with sober intelligence, "present, die; past, dead; perfect participle, buried!"

When our youngest was a very small boy in kilts, he was one day listening to the older members of the family discussing bones; and when an older brother asked: "What are ribs?" the little lad replied quite solemnly, "I know what ribs are—they are the bones that go around the corners of you."

My little daughter sat upon the floor deeply engrossed with the latest acquisition to her nursery—a rubber doll fitted with a whistle in its back. She was delighted with the wails it produced when she squeezed it between her chubby hands. Suddenly, as if struck with a new idea, she scrambled to her feet and backing up to me said excitedly: "Now find de hole in my back, muzzer." "But, baby, there is no hole in your back," I assured her. "Den where does my cry tum fum?" she demanded, turning incredulous eyes upon me.

Mrs. Subbubs (prompting)—"Amen!" Now, go to sleep. Little Elsie—But I'm not through yet. Mrs. Subbubs—Yes, you are. You said "God bless mamma and papa," and all the rest. Little Elsie—But I want to say, "God bless Bridget, and make her a good girl, so she can stay a few days."

What Women Have Said About Men

There is a strong presumption that "Mere Man" so dubbed himself when in one of his many moods, and he probably wanted something that an humble attitude might win the sooner.—Sarah Grand.

God made man in His own image, and though man spoils himself in the making, and loses his proper pattern and falls out of shape, the original mould is not broken yet—nor never will be—trust the Lord for that.—Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler.

The man who admires silent women loses his heart to a chatterbox and spends the rest of his mortal life in teaching her how to hold her tongue.—Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler.

Masculine tenderness is said to respond to tears. I do not find it so. Rather, I should say that a man's devotion fades under salt water, like a bathing suit in the very element for which it is supposed to be adapted.—Mary Adams.

There is a tale of a man who spent his whole life in wishing he had lived differently; and when he died he was surrounded by a throng of spectred shapes, each one exactly like the other, who, on his asking what they were, replied: "We are all the different lives you might have lived."—Edith Wharton.

The extreme penalty for bigamy is the plurality of mothers-in-law which it necessitates.—Nellie Cravey Gillmore.

Beware of loving a man. Today he says: "I love you, I need you! I shall go to the devil without you!" Tomorrow he turns to his affairs. In six months he says: "I was a fool!" Next year he says: "Who was it that drove me wild for a time last year? What was her name?"—Mary Hartwell Catherwood.

Men, even the worthy ones who will make sacrifices in the big things which women cannot nerve themselves to meet, are proverbially selfish in all these little things that make or mar the life of every day.—Lavinia Hart.

We have got over thinking that the mother has all the love and the father all the intelligence.—Mrs. R. Burdette.

The sacredness of a father's love and sorrow never is recognized as is the mother's. "Would to God that I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!" cried mighty David in his agony of grief; and today, in any thoroughfare through which we pass, men go about their daily avocations with such steadfast courage as they may, whose hearts echo this bitter wail in silence.—Mrs. Farley Cox.

A man can never do anything at variance with his own nature. He carries within him the germ of his most exceptional action; and if we wise people make eminent fools of ourselves on any particular occasion, we must endure the legitimate conclusion that we carry a few grains of folly to our ounce of wisdom.—George Eliot.

The thing which impresses one most and fills one with the greatest respect for man is the courage with which he faces life. Day after day the working man in all classes of society, on whom a family depends, faces life far too often with the trials intensified by fear that the strength which means bread may give out.—Sarah Grand.

Ambrosial Decoction Called Punch

glass of the best Burgundy; and while stirring it slowly add a pony of Santa Cruz rum, and you will have one of the coolest and most delightful drinks of all. The pleasure of it may be enhanced, along with the expense, if you wish, by adding a bouquet finish of ice cream and berries.

A splendid champagne punch may be compounded in the following proportions (my own invention): Six bottles of champagne, a quart of Jamaica rum, a pint of maraschino, a gallon of green tea, or water, lemon juice and sugar according to the taste, in a large punch-bowl, having in the centre a cubic iceberg, ornamented on the top with rock-candy, loaf-sugar, sliced lemons or oranges, or both, and other fruits.

Another champagne punch may be made as follows: Take, say, three bottles of good champagne and boil it. At the moment of ebullition add a little Jamaica rum, cinnamon, vanilla, cloves, and the rind of a lemon. When the whole has boiled up again, cover the pan hermetically and leave it in a cool place for twenty-four hours. Then serve cold. Al Levy of Los Angeles once said that with the aid of a glass of this cordial between each waltz a man who is free from rheumatism can dance eight hours in succession.

Santa Cruz rum punch is a favorite drink in Philadelphia, or was for many years. Its manufacture is about the same as a whisky or brandy punch. For light drinkers there is the claret punch, the port wine punch and the cobbler. This latter—sherry, claret, catawba, or sauterne—is simply wine, ice, sugar, and a slice of orange or a piece of lemon-peel, and fruits in season as a floating ornament, sipped through a straw, invented in the United States, and a favorite in all countries during the hot months.

Another excellent drink, especially for invalids, is the milk punch, which should be made as follows: One-half teaspoonful of sugar and two of water, a wine-glass of cognac, and half as much Jamaica rum, half a glassful of shaved ice, the glass filled up with milk, and floating a flavor of nutmeg. Hot milk punch, the same, with the omission of the ice, and the substitution of hot milk instead of cold.

Here is the recipe for the famous milk-punch which George IV. drank with his dinner for several years, and which his majesty declared to be beneficial both to the digestion and to the faculties. Lord Sefton, the renowned gourmet, thought he had achieved a great triumph when he managed to get hold of this receipe by bribing the Carleton House employees, after his quarrel with "the First Gentleman in Europe."

"Put two quarts of really fine old rum in a basin, with the thinly cut peels of twenty-four lemons and six Seville oranges (or twelve ordinary oranges) and two thick slices of ripe pine-apple (English for choice), cut into small pieces. Cover the basin up and leave it for twelve hours. Then turn the above into a tub, or other suitable vessel. Add a pint of lemon-juice, half a pint of orange-juice, two bottles of Jamaica rum, four quarts of green tea, in which two pounds of loaf sugar have been dissolved, a bottle of Maderia, a pint of maraschino, half a pint of dry curacoa, two grated nutmegs, and, finally, after the above materials have been briskly stirred, pour slowly in two quarts of hot milk. Cover up the tub and let it stand six hours, giving it an occasional stir. Then it must be slowly and carefully strained three times through flannel jelly-bags, and at once bottled. Let the bottles be thoroughly corked." This punch ought to be kept for at least a month, and the longer it is kept the better it will be. It should be iced before being consumed.

Roman punch, so-called, is not a beverage; nor is it an actual ice or a frozen cream. It is just a nice intermediary of a stylish home dinner, or banquet, and may come between the piece de resistance and salad; or, if there are a number of entrees and meat or game courses, just before the principal roast. The Roman punch is not of American origin, but is national by adoption, and is made from various formulas. Its history is curious and romantic. It had been the summer refreshment of successive Popes for over eighty years, and their chefs were threatened with all kinds of horrors and punishments if they ever divulged the secret of its preparation. When Napoleon invaded Italy in 1796 this terrible interdict was broken through. A son of Pius VI.'s chief confectioner, by name Molas, as soon as he found the French were conquerors, ran away from his father and united his fortunes with them. This young man became the favorite servant of the Empress Josephine, and after her death became cook to the Russian Prince Lieven, whom he accompanied to London when that Prince was appointed Ambassador to the Court of St. James. This Russian first made his Papal beverage in London by introducing it at the Prince's table. The Prince Regent asked for the recipe and permitted copies to be given to a select few of his friends, and by degrees it became better known and is now well known all over the world.

The original Vatican recipe is: "Prepare a very rich pineapple or sherbet; have it a little tart with lemon juice, taking the greatest care that none of the zest or oil from the yellow rind or the bitterness from the white underlying pith be allowed to enter into the composition of this sherbet. In order to be certain of this it is better first to grate off the yellow rind from the lemons, then to carefully remove all the white pitch, and, "to make assurance doubly sure," wash the skinned fruit in clear water; after which press out the juice free from the rind of the fruit; strain the juice so as to remove all the seeds or pips from it; then add it to the pineapple mixture. It must be then very well frozen. This sherbet, being very rich, will not freeze hard, but will be a semi-ice. Just before the punch is to be served add and work into it for every quart of ice one gill of Jamaica rum, and for every two quarts one pint of the best champagne. Never use the wine from damaged bottles or leaky corks, as it will be sure to deprave and perhaps entirely spoil your punch."

Another Roman punch may be prepared as follows: Two quarts of water, one pound of sugar, five lemons, one quart of champagne, one-half pint of Jamaica rum. Boil the sugar and water together for fifteen minutes. Take it from the fire and when perfectly cold add the juice of the lemons. Put it into a freezer, and when about half frozen add the rum and champagne. Let the punch stand in the freezer packed in ice for two hours before serving.

"There is nothing the matter with me, my flower. Rouse Lakdar. I must go. Show me the door."

"No, not yet. Let Lakdar sleep. It is good for him. You look like Sliman, who was a shepherd at Chiffa. He was the only man I ever loved. Ah, the kisses we exchanged there in the mountains, with the asphodels whitening under the dwarf-palms! He followed me to Algiers, and death carried him off almost at once. He sleeps now under the fennel in the cemetery of Abd-el-Kader. Every djema I go and whisper words of love to him through the black earth. It seems to me now that it is he who is with me. Allah is great!"

Yamina's lips sought mine. I pushed her away. But it was impossible for me to arise. I fell back upon the cushions, while Yamina smilingly clasped me in her arms.

"It is useless, you see, you cannot go away. I put a few grains of Smyrna in your hasheesh—"

My mind was whirling like the desert sands in a simoom.

"Yamina, listen to me," I said. "What if Lakdar should see us!"

"Have no fear. If he should make the least movement I would call M'Kaufi. He is behind the screen. He is waiting. He is a great negro from Davar, and he is devoted to me, body and soul. I need but say a word, and his mighty hand will fall upon Lakdar—and then Lakdar will be no more than the agha—the first into whose throat M'Koufi plunged his yatagan. He still had strength left to smile at me sadly and say:

"'Yamina, I thought you were a star of the beautiful, perfumed night, and you are only the black pebble that bruises the heel of the unwary,' and then he dipped his hand in the blood of his wound and set it upon that square of silk, adding, 'Yamina, I forgive you. May this hand, imprinted by the dead, preserve you and your house from the evil eye!'

"Since that day happiness has dwelt in my house. That crimson hand drives away the djinns and attracts the good spirits to me; but the agha's death gave me a thirst for blood that will not be quenched. Many times at a signal from me has M'Koufi's yatagan sunk into men's throats. I adore gasping wounds that are like hideous mouths vomiting the wine cursed by the Prophet. This morning I decided to have Lakdar killed as soon as he had come here, but when I saw you my thoughts were turned from the desire for death to the desire for love. I am sure that your lips still hold Sliman's kisses. Oh, give them to me, give them to me—"

My mind became a blank. I remember only vaguely the passionate words she murmured while she covered me with caresses.

When I awoke Lakdar was listening with a drowsy smile to a Kabyle legend Yamina was telling him. They were drinking fragrant coffee from the cups in the filigree eggshells—and from the ivory coffer the bloody hand had disappeared.

Auto Notes

A. R. Dawson who has been connected with the automobile business as salesman for the past five years, has joined the selling forces of the Pioneer Automobile Company, making his headquarters in Oakland.

Mr. C. E. Mathewson is in receipt of advice from his factory today that the Shawmut car in the New York-Seattle transcontinental race which is equipped with Diamond Tires has experienced no trouble with them whatever up to date, the car having already covered one-half the distance it is to run.

After eight months of continuous driving, during which time more than 33,000 miles have been covered, the greater portion of that mileage being made on through runs from this city to Los Angeles and back, J. R. McAllister of this city and Bakersfield, brought his car, a Studebaker "30," to the Studebaker Bros. last Thursday to be overhauled. To the surprise of McAllister and foreman Drumm of the Studebaker repair shop, all the transmission gears were found to be in perfect condition and the bearings as well. The car also has made a record for the Diamond tire on the left front wheel which has never even punctured and has never been removed from the wheel during the running up of the 33,000 miles. Sunday the car was taken out over the boulevard for the purpose of trying it out. There it encountered a team of horses attached to a large dray wagon trying to pull a "stalled" automobile up the hill. The horses were unable to move the "stalled" machine so the assistance of McAllister's Studebaker was added. The machine pulled both the dray and "stalled" auto out of their combined difficulties, while several who witnessed the "stunt" cheered the Studebaker.

Among the owners of Buick "White Streaks" who are constantly touring over the State, Dr. H. I. Wiel of San Francisco is setting a hot pace. He seems to have acquired the Del Monte habit and for seven consecutive Saturdays he has made the run down to the Monterey Bay resort, returning each Sunday via Santa Cruz. Dr. Wiel has made one trip to Tahoe in his little "White Streak" and will soon leave for that point on his second trip.

The roads to Congress Springs are in fair condition, and the trip affords an easy journey for a day's tour. Last Sunday Dr. and Mrs. R. W. Meek of Oakland motored down there in their little six Thomas, and chaperoned the following: Miss Margaret and Miss Gertrude Meek, Miss Christine Turner and Horace Meek, who acted as "The Lightning Conductor."

Capt. W. B. Burtt, 20th Infantry, U. S. A., before sailing for Manilla on the army transport Logan, took delivery from the Howard Automobile Company of a Buick "White Streak," which he is taking with him for service in the Philippine Islands.

The following information from C. W. Hallowell of Susanville, Cal., will prove of considerable value to motorists who are planning runs to Reno, Nev., or points in California within a radius of one hundred miles of the Nevada metropolis. Hallowell is an enthusiastic motorist and has spent much time this year at the wheel of his Studebaker touring car. The data furnished by Hallowell is gleamed from a letter he recently sent to local Studebaker Bros.: "Reno to Susanville, a distance of 20 miles is all over good roads, that is, via Milford and Janesville, at which places gasoline is usually obtainable. The road is marked with very few grades except the first five miles out of Reno which likewise has a few sandy spots. Plumas Junction is also a stopping place, the latter 25 miles from Reno. Milford is 65 miles from Reno, and Janesville 80 miles. Susanville to Greenville is a route sometimes taken as it furnished a short-cut, but the road is not as yet open. The grade is exceedingly heavy and exceptionally poor for automobiles as there are no stopping places en route. Susanville to Prattville, Taylorville, Crescent Mills and Quincy, via Mountain Meadows and Big Meadows. The road will be in good shape in thirty days. It is never open during the winter months but during the other seasons of the year this road provides a beautiful trip through the famous fishing grounds at Big Meadows, Clear Creek and Mountain Meadows. All of these places are excellent stopping places and gasoline may be had at any one of them."

There are few Americans of wealth who take life as satisfactorily as does N. A. Moorehouse of Los Angeles. He is an old Californian, having come to the Golden State in the early seventies, and is now using just as good judgment and originality in enjoying his fortune as he used in those early days in mining and real estate speculation, when he was standing up and hitting from the shoulder, while making it. He has automobile touring down to the finest point for enjoying the western country. With his wife and son, cook and chauffeur, and two cars, he is touring from Los Angeles to Seattle, intending to return in about September. Mr. Moorehouse bothers about no speed records, but certainly holds all the medals for a properly outfitted entourage. His mainstay is a 1906 Thomas Flyer Touring Car. This one is a noble old boat which he has used steadily for touring each year and has it fitted with a complete camping outfit. The running boards are loaded with huge well filled boxes containing everything needed in provisions and camping kits. Bedding is carefully rolled in canvas and piled in the tonneau and on back racks. Well made canvas leather bound bags are tucked and strapped in all sorts of places and make possible the carrying of everything needed for personal belongings or camping needs. Mr. Moorehouse thinks his Thomas machine is too good to wear out even with all the travel and that when he has compassed a few more mountain tours in the next few years, he can use her for even submarine work and get away with it. To complete his caravan he has a light smaller car which he uses as a sort of convoy. It carries extra camping equipment and some of the party, Mr. and Mr. Moorehouse always riding in the Thomas Flyer, however. With the two machines and all their equipment, they are hindered in the enjoyment of their outdoor life by nothing. They go through the country with the careless freedom of gypsies and with the luxury and assurance of potentates.

Letters

"In a Mysterious Way"

It is to be feared that most readers of Anne Warner's new novel will dismiss Alva with Mrs. Ray's sententious verdict, "I think she's mooney," though in matters apart from her love and contemplated marriage she was practical enough. Alva was a summer boarder in one of the numerous little villages near Niagara. She was a perpetual source of interest to the inhabitants, who were all convinced that there was a love affair between her and the engineer who was investigating into the feasibility of building a dam which, while it would destroy all the natural beauties of the locality, would make a few rich men richer and, so the villagers hoped, eradicate their rivals and turn at least a small golden stream their own way. Alva had bought a house in the vicinity and was having it renovated with a feverish activity which the people of Ledge could interpret in no other way than as meant for a domicile in which to live while Ingram was held in the vicinity, and the culminating point of their astonishment lay in the fact of her having a bath room put in. Alva's real love story was something so etherial as to belong to cloudland while Ingram, being a very flesh and blood individual, found his affinity in some one more substantial. But apart from this, we come back to what we have become accustomed to consider the real Mrs. Warner when she deals with village types and incidents. Mrs. Ray, who takes in washing, manages all the active work of her farm, keeps boarders, officiates as church sexton, does the tailoring and barbering, runs a small grocery, and holds the federal office of post mistress, besides taking hold of every other loose end, is as unique as Susan Clegg. She talks nearly as much, but, unlike Susan, she does permit others to complete a sentence now and then. "I never say no to any kind of work, do I?" says she. "This would be a nice time of life for me to sit around and say no to work. What with Mr. Ray's second wife's children not all educated yet and his first wife's children getting along to where they're beginning to be left widows with six apiece and no life insurance, I'm likely to want all the work I can get for some years, as far as I can see. Yes, indeed." But Mrs. Ray is a cheerful gossip, if one may call her so, and she is by no means the only "character." Her confab with Mrs. Wiley over the making of that winter coat deserves to become a favorite with public readers, and her shrewd comments and criticisms are tonic. The O'Neils, who kept the play-house hotel and were so victimized by the Lathbuns, Joey Beall, who had a genius for spying out lovers, Uncle Purchase, Pinkie, Sammy Adams, Mary Cody, and "Poor Clay Wright Benton" and the parrot fit together like pieces of a puzzle. It does seem as though Mrs. Warner must have happened on her outlandish corners ready made. However much one may sympathize with Alva in her love for the beautiful and her spiritual aims, she was too etheral for this prosaic world, and it was just as well that her shadowy love story ended as it did. SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 22931, Dept. No. 10.

CATHERINE FRANCIS BERTRAND, Plaintiff,
vs.
BENJAMIN A. BERTRAND, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City of and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to Benjamin A. Bertrand, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion of said plaintiff; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 11th day of May, A. D. 1909. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco State of California—No. 16627.

ROBERT HECTOR, Jr., Plaintiff,
vs.
All Persons Claiming Any Interest in or Lien Upon the Real Property Herein Described, or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California, to all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Robert Hector, Jr., plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest, or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly described as follows, to wit:

Lot number 210 as laid down, delineated and designated on a certain map on file in the office of the recorder of the said City and County of San Francisco, known as "Holiday Map A." Said map was filed in the office of the recorder of the City and County of San Francisco on the 1st day of May 1863.

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to wit, that it be adjudged that plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute, that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, or whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description, and that plaintiff recover costs herein, and have such other and further relief as may seem meet and proper in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 4th day of June, 1909.
(Seal) H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.
By JAS. P. KANE, Deputy Clerk.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 22419, Dept. No. 10.

HILDA M. WILSON, Plaintiff,
vs
FRANK J. WILSON, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to Frank J. Wilson, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion of plaintiff; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 14th day of April, A. D. 1909. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.
(Seal) By W. R. CASTAGNETTO, Deputy Clerk.

A. MORGENTHAL, Attorney for Plaintiff,

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY ORDER OF SALE OF REAL AND PERSONAL ESTATE AT PRIVATE SALE SHOULD NOT BE GRANTED

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 6670, Dept. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of JOHN DEMARTINI, Deceased.

FLORA DEMARTINI, as Administratrix of the estate of John Demartini, deceased, having presented to this Court her verified petition for sale of all the real and personal property of which said decedent died seized and possessed, as far as known to your petitioner, which property is situated in the County of Tulare, State of California, and which is fully described in the petition of said administratrix, to which reference is made;

And it appearing therefrom that it is necessary to sell the whole thereof in order to pay the debts against the estate and costs of administration;

It is ordered that said petition be filed, and all persons interested in the estate of said John Demartini, deceased are directed to appear before the Court on the 20th day of July, 1909, at 10 o'clock a. m. of said last named date, at the courtroom of said Court, Grant Building, Southeast corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be granted to said administratrix to sell at private sale all of said real estate and the personal property belonging to the estate of said John Demartini, deceased, as prayed for in said petition; and it is further ordered that a copy of this order be published four (4) successive weeks in the "Town Talk," a newspaper printed and published in the said City and County of San Francisco.

Done in open Court this 10th day of June, 1909.
THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge.

Endorsed: Filed June 11, 1909. H. I. Mulcrevy, Clerk, by H. G. Benedict, Deputy Clerk.

A City's Woes

There is a good deal of discontent in this city. Amid the clamor of corporation baiters, the sinister recommendations of factional politicians, the demagogic yawpings of a parochial and malevolent press, there is confusion and chaos, and the dire effects of civil discord flow on with no prospect of abatement. We are in one sense an easy-going community. Micawber-like, patiently we look forward, confident that something grateful to the senses will turn up. Like those Frenchmen who, in 1870, lulled themselves into a feeling of security with the persuasion that Paris was under the protection of the shadow of the name of a Republic we make no effort to change the complexion of events. In the same optimistic spirit we, who are easily pleased, easily excited and hoodwinked easily, say to ourselves, "We have been born to factional strife, it is no use to try to unite opinion and get together for the common weal." This metaphysical abstraction keeps us quiescent. The men who really have the interest of the city at heart are invertebrates who delude themselves with the philosophy of hope. They may rage inwardly when they find the mischievous advocates of municipal ownership urging that another appeal be made to the dear people to vote for the street railroad bond issue, but they will not undertake to abate the zeal of the promoters of turmoil and trouble. They sit idly by while assurance puts protest out of countenance and audacious perseverance in spite of rebuffs runs on in pursuit of its object. Are there no ways and means of bringing this city to its senses? Must we be forever tormented by the machinations of vindictive demagogues? The cynic doubtless is inclined to take a pessimistic view of the matter, but we do not regard the situation as hopeless.

Rampant Phelanism

We have a suggestion to make which we think is worthy of serious consideration. It is this,—that an organized effort be made to redeem the city from the chaos into which it has been plunged by vindictive agitators. What we need is not so much a new deal in municipal government as a new spirit in the community itself—a substitution of the sweetness and light that Matthew Arnold talks about for the master passion of hatred that like Aaron's serpent swallows up all the rest. This we cannot have unless new men come to the front and establish the principle of co-operation between our civic organizations and our public servants. More important to this city than the average citizen imagines is the suppression of the perennial civic patriots of the Isidore Jacobs type and the E. P. E. Troy calibre. What San Francisco needs is a civic welfare association composed of men who are not responsive to the dictates of Boss Jimmy Phelan. The disease from which San Francisco has been suffering for many years is Phelanism. The little man who has been masking himself behind a two-cent stamp incarnates the spirit of dissension which torments this city. The effects of this spirit are pernicious to the last degree, not only with regard to the government itself but to those passions which are produced in the heart of every individual. A malignant spirit this, and when it rages as it does in this city, breaks out in falsehood, detraction and calumny and extinguishes all the better and kindlier instincts of human nature.

Our Powerful Boss

At first blush it will seem that our conception of Phelanism is somewhat overstrained. It is hard to believe that one man can torment a whole community for a long period of years. But after intelligent analysis of the situation it will be found that we have actually hit the nail on the head. The influence that is exercised by this pernicious political trickster has come to him as a result of years of persistent endeavor. Let us glance back over the history of his activities. A man of great property interests, when in the dawn of his career he began to manifest a zeal for the public welfare he received a most cordial greeting, for it was deemed most commendable that a man of his wealth should be animated by the noble virtue of civic patriotism. It was refreshing to find a man of his wealth and education eager to realize exalted ideals in respect of government and intent upon purifying politics and redeeming his native city from corruption. Public confidence met him half way with widespread arms and heaving midriff. He took hold of affairs and gave promise of being a most efficient reformer. While it was generally known that it was his ambition to become a United States Senator, it was supposed that the greater part of his political activity was inspired by the purest motives, but the cloven hoof was not long concealed. It soon became apparent that it was his purpose to organize a political machine, and to that end he worked untiringly and not always with clean hands. A demagogue at heart, vindictive by nature and in his inordinate vanity impatient of opposition, he produced disgust and distrust and the Byzantine nimbus faded from his brow. But Mr. Phelan has never lost heart. Rebukes, rebuffs, political setbacks, revelations of a Machiavellian code of morals; all these have served to impair his prestige but not to hold him check. His wealth has supplied him with sycophants for shadows and journalists for handmaidens, and by dint of cant and hypocrisy, cunning and perseverance he has always managed to keep the situation pretty well in hand. While other citizens of equal wealth and equally capable of imparting dignity and distinction to occasions of public importance have made no effort to obtain recognition, the tireless Phelan has never neglected his opportunities. He is always to the front with a speech and a gladhand. His retainers and touts, always active in his behalf, are prominent in almost every political and civic organization in the city. They are constantly echoing his sentiments, propagating his censures and strictures and challenging honesty wherever argument is futile. The ramifications of the Phelan knockery are interminable. They extend through journalism to the pulpit, from the Labor Council to the Pacific-Union Club. Boss Phelan controls the Board of Supervisors. One of the supervisors is his attorney. Boss Phelan is a park commissioner and a trustee of the Free Library. The Boughten Bulletin which scatters venom for hire is his mouthpiece. The Good Government League is his personally conducted institution, as sensitive to his emotions as are two of our judges and the district attorney's office and the Hickey section of the democratic machine. Is there another man in San Francisco with the influence that is possessed by James D. Phelan? Can any one conceive of a greater evil than that of having a man of Phelan's temperament in control of so great a sphere of influence as that which is subject to his whims and prejudices? It is because we thoroughly apprehend the character and extent of his influence that we take this occasion of sounding the alarm, of calling for the organization of a civic welfare association, and incidentally suggesting that something be done toward disciplining our demagogic press. It is within the power of the merchants of this city, who are the principal suffers from factional strife and demagogic counsel, to compel every newspaper to pursue a sane policy for the benefit of the whole city.

A Supervisor's Lament

"It seems too bad," says Supervisor Connolly, "that the law is so drawn that it requires a two-third's vote on bond propositions, when in an election for the choice of a man for office plurality will carry through." How like a statesman doth Supervisor Connolly utter himself! Though it never occurred to us before, on reflection prompted by Mayor Taylor's distinguished young protege we perceive that it is rather odd that we should have so little difficulty in acquiring the services of statesmen of the Connolly type while finding it so hard to indulge the erratic appetite of the gullible mob for the fads and fancies of political doctrinaires and taxeaters. Mysterious indeed are the ways of the divinity that shapes our ends, rough hew them as we may, and which protects fools, drunkards, the United States and the cities thereof. But the discriminating law that broadens the pathway of the Connollys while discouraging the tendency of the multitude to spend money like drunken sailors and fly to follies in government they know not of, may not be wholly bad. Of course the judgment of so learned a statesman as the Mayor's protege gives us pause. We are deferential to the views of a man of profound foresight, abysmal hindsight and telescopic insight. We cannot but respect the opinion of a man of mighty ideas which he gratuitously sloughs as sloughs a snake its skin, but we have a sentimental reverence for everything that has come down to us through the ages as has this very principle which meets with the unqualified disapprobation of Supervisor Connolly. From time immemorial students of political science have deemed it advisable to safeguard the masses against their impulses in matters affecting their vital interests. One of the things that has always been considered of vital interest to a people is the cost of government, and though it may seem unreasonable to suppose that the people would favor extravagance in governmental affairs, the fact is that there is no matter in which all of the people may not be fooled some of the time. The proneness of the people to folly must always be reckoned with, say the students of political science. It was reckoned with by the founders of our government; even by Thomas Jefferson, as good a Democrat as Supervisor Connolly. With all his prejudice in favor of democratic principles, no man has less respect for the mentality of the multitude than had the Virginian statesman; no man ever declaimed more eloquently against appealing to the mob. Coming nearer home we find another distinguished statesman who reckoned with the susceptibility of the multitude to the blandishments of demagogic taxeaters and their journalistic accomplices. We allude of course to the Hon. E. Robson Taylor. the Admirable Crichton of our prosperous city. Mayor Taylor was one of the framers of the Charter which is now the organic law of this municipality and which was adopted by a majority vote. Mayor Taylor and his confreres were responsible for the principle which has excited the censorious spirit of Mr. Connolly, a principle that is universally recognized in this country. Mayor Taylor may have changed his views to coincide with those of his protege, but if so the change cannot be attributed to any new light thrown upon political science. The principle that he was guided by when the Charter was in the making is still beloved by all statesmen who are not in favor of allowing the lazy and inefficient to triumph over the industrious and competent. In New York, which is a somewhat older commonwealth than ours, the principle is applied even more strictly than in this State, for while our public servants are privileged to submit any number of financial propositions to the people in one week, those of the eastern States are inhibited from submitting more than one in a year. But, as we have suggested, it is by no means certain that the head of our automobile administration is still wedded to the principle which he approved in the days before he dreamt of becoming the inspiration and pride of the blithesome band of bond boomers who spend prodigally and are ever finding new taxes to defray extravagance that never stops.

The Pope and Professor Briggs

Readers of the North American Review have been regaled from time to time with articles in which the trend of conservative Catholicism has been viewed with the most melancholy forebodings while the flame of so-called "modernism" has been fanned with no little enthusiasm. Several of these articles have come from the pen of one Briggs, who, being of Presbyterian persuasion and a professor of Presbyterian theology, is enabled to approach his favorite subject of papal errors without that partiality (and it may be also, without that knowledge) which would undoubtedly be the contribution of a Catholic divine to the discussion. In the June North American, Professor Briggs may be said to have surpassed his previous efforts in pessimistic criticism of the Vatican and ardent praise of the "modernists." As the editor of the North American sees fit to tell his readers that Professor Briggs enjoys "world-wide fame" as a "profound theologian and a conscientious thinker," it may be well to call attention here to some of the pronouncements of this New Jersey doctor of divinity to the end that those who have heretofore ignored his claims to distinction may be given a taste of his quality.

Conquering any feeling of ministerial humility which might cause him to hesitate in interpreting the mysterious purposes of the Almighty, Briggs attacks his subject by declaring that "modernism still continues to agitate the Roman Catholic Church, and will continue its work until it accomplishes its Providential mission"; showing conclusively by this dictum that any little gift of infallibility to which the Pope may lay claim must pale beside Briggs's supernatural power of cognition. Briggs is the mouthpiece of Providence. Evidently he is better posted on heavenly affairs than on sublunary doings, for he tells us "the battle between Modernism and the Papacy is raging all over the Christian world," a statement which will rather startle the Catholic hierarchy of the United States (to mention no other countries) where modernism has so far been confined to Protestant critics of orthodox Catholics. Briggs has it that "the despotic attempts of the Curia to crush it have been vain"; that "the public press of the world is boiling with indignation"; and his long years of practice of the gentle art of teaching do not prevent him from using such harsh expressions as "arrogant dictation" and "impertinent interference."

A New View of Pius X

But it is in unmasking the diabolical influence exerted over the Supreme Pontiff of Catholicism by the college of cardinals or by some members of that august body, that Professor Briggs exhibits the sweet restraint and temperate judgment of a scholarly theologian at their best. Taking for his proposition the statement that "the Pope has been systematically deceived," Professor Briggs demonstrates it after this conclusive fashion: "The Pope, nominally the sovereign of the church, is really now, as previous Popes have usually been, in the hands of a bureaucracy which in its own interests constantly misleads him in the most important matters. A simple-minded, devout man, with the best intentions for moral and religious reform, but without diplomatic experience and inexpert in the detection of intrigues, he remains shut up in the Vatican, carefully guarded from all improper associations, courted by adoring pilgrims and obsequious officials. He does not, and cannot, know any more of the outer world than is strained out to him through the screens of a multitude of flatterers and self-seekers. The few candid and straightforward men who are admitted to brief interviews are drowned, as it were, in the ocean of flatterers, and the frank words of the Pope to these are always denied or explained away in the official journals." Here surely is a condition heretofore unsuspected, warranted to make a bishop weep and a humble layman besiege heaven with supplications for the preservation of the Papacy for yet a few years longer. At this rate the bark of Peter must be perilously near the rocks, and mayhap neither weeping nor prayer will suffice to keep it in safe waters. Casting about for the remedy for this parlous state of affairs we humbly hesitate to intervene; but we think we can suggest a remedy that will seem satisfactory to the complacent theologian of New Jersey. Is it not possible in this extremity to make Professor Briggs Pope in order that he may save the church from wreck? That he considers himself competent to rule Christendom we have no doubt, for he approves some of the reforms which were started by the present pontiff, not without hinting, however, that he suggested them himself. Also he forecasts what is going to happen to the church; why not make him the instrument for the fulfillment of his own prophecy?

Phantoms

(From the German of Heinrich Heine)

Oh, Joy is but a blithe deceiver,
That will not long beside you stay;
She kindly cools your brow's hot fever,
She gives a kiss—and trips away.

But old Dame Sorrow pours her blessing
With pious fervor on your head;
She says her business is not pressing,
Sits down and knits beside your bed.

The Greater Danger

But in the time of storm have care;
Fear these, but fear her more!"

Perspective Impressions

If Judge Lawlor has the courage of Rudolph Spreckels' convictions he will not permit himself to be smoked out.

If Mr. Phelan wants to run for mayor it is to be hoped that he will be permitted to go up single-handed against the embattled McCarthy.

John D. Jr. suspects his Uncle Rudie of being in bad business. Which reminds us that Claus Spreckels threw his beautiful progeny a juicy bone not long ago.

As a matter of fact a man of the Hon. James D. Phelan's dimensions ought to have no difficulty in masking himself behind a two-cent stamp.

Medical experts have recommended more lard for E. H. Harriman's ribs. Come to think of it the railroad magnate has a lean and hungry look—which probably explains the aversion of the American Caesar.

Mr. Hearst again reminds us that he gave us the Direct Primary law. In all probability it will not be long before he will wish us to forget it.

In the current McClure's there is an appreciation of Fremont Older by Mrs. Fremont Older. Literary critics will probably pronounce it the best piece of fiction that Mrs. Older ever wrote.

Another one of the wreckers of the California Safe Deposit and Trust Company has been given his freedom by our kind-hearted District Attorney. Mr. Langdon has wonderful powers of discrimination.

Machiavelli, who was a friend of liberty, wrote a book with a view of teaching that principalities should be governed by mendacity and fraud and that the worst rule is justified by the success of its sway and excused by the perversity of the mob. Does it not appear that the noble Italian has zealous disciples in San Francisco?

What Mars Thinks of Us

Extraordinary Discourse of a Learned Savant Who Has Investigated the Subject of Martian Intellectuality and the Intelligence of Bugs and Made Comparison With the Puny Mentality of the Earth Folk.

By Democritus

My friend Professor Erasmus Hochstadter, M. A., D. S., F. R. A. S., of Napa, is very much amused at the proposition of Professor Pickering to communicate with Mars by means of signals flashed from mirrors.

"Preposterous!" he comments with bitter scorn. "Preposterous! Why don't these scientific nincompoops turn about and try to 'communicate' with something they can reach? Why don't they invent instruments that will bring them into intimate contact with the insects? Do these sublimated fools know that the bugs are trying to 'communicate' with human beings; that the infusoria and the amoebas are striving to find out what sort of creatures we are and why we are a part of the natural order—what function we perform in the economy of the universe and the true reason for our existence on a planet and in an environment that was obviously intended for the occupancy of bugs, infusoria and amoebas exclusively. These insects and rhizopods are much puzzled at our continued presence here and their most learned scientists are constantly endeavoring to solve the problem. Our own scientists ought to make an effort to get into communication with the insectivorous scientific societies and establish a sort of scientific comity on a common plane of mutual understanding. It is true that our entomologists have microscoped the insect world, but they have pursued their investigations from the wrong angle. They have looked at the bugs only from the standpoint of a superior order of creation; whereas the bugs are looking at us from the same altitude but from quite another incidence of observation. If our bugs and the other bugs could get together something really scientific might result. Nothing scientific will ever come of Pickering's idiotic theory."

Professor Hochstadter stroked his long, gray beard meditatively and then resumed his discourse.

"The Martians," he said, "are to us as we think we are to the bugs. Our superlative is expressed in the phrase 'giants of intellect'; the Martians are more than that in comparison with us. If a Martian were to come among us we should be compelled to treat him as a god, for a Martian is a god in comparison with the wisest beings that have ever lived on this earth. If Francis Bacon could have visited Mars he would have been classed by the Martians with their monkey people; but the monkey people of Mars would have pushed him still lower in the scale of animate nature. Dr. Jordan of Stanford and Dr. Wheeler of the State University wouldn't be recognized in Mars as intelligent human beings. And in their small way Dr. Jordan and Dr. Wheeler would almost realize their inferiority to the Martians."

The savant paused a moment and looked around on the little group of listeners that had gathered about him. Professor Hochstadter is one of the most interesting characters in Napa. He has been there a long time and he is very highly esteemed for his learning and much beloved for his gentle, amiable disposition. Someone asked him how he knew all this.

"Telepathy," he responded; "telepathy. I have in my laboratory a very delicate instrument which records the thought waves of Mars, and by putting myself en rapport with the instrument I am able to comprehend some of the simpler movements of the indicator. Mars is constantly giving off these thought waves, most of which are so complex and so highly charged with intellectuality that it is impossible for the human intellect to translate them. By this same instrument I know what the bugs are thinking, and you will probably disbelieve me when I say that a learned bug is the equal in learning to the most learned of men. I am not sure that there may not be tribes of bugs containing insects even more learned than men, but as yet I have not found them, for I have been able to understand the thoughts of all the bugs whose intellectuality has come in contact with my instrument. But with the Martians it is different. Perhaps I can illustrate better by saying that if Dr. Taylor, the Mayor of San Francisco, should read his poetry to a little child the child would be as able to understand what it was all about as one of you would be able to understand what a Martian was thinking. Again I must explain. A Martian does not utter his thoughts in words when he wishes to convey those thoughts to another Martian—he merely thinks in the direction of the other Martian, and if the objective Martian is properly adjusted to receive the communication he is instantly aware what the other Martian is sending. Every Martian is a wireless telegraph, so to speak. There are no telescopes in Mars, yet the inhabitants of Mars can see everything that is going on in the sidereal universe from Aldeberan to Capella and for a considerable distance along the arc of the Milky Way. It is a sort of long distance clairvoyance. Neither are there microscopes in Mars, yet the Martians are able to observe the minutest details of life on any of the planets within a billion miles of their own planet. This is accomplished by contracting the scope of their mental vision and concentrating the dynamic power of their thought. They know as much about us earth worms as we know about bugs—and more, for they know that we are trying to think while our entomologists labor under the erroneous impression that bugs are only bugs. The Martian microscopists, for instance, are at this moment studying San Francisco as one of our microscopists would study a culture of typhoid bacteria on a glass slide."

One of the Professor's auditors wanted to know what the Martians made of San Francisco.

"I'm afraid they don't make very much of that city," the scientist answered. "As nearly as I can translate the waves on my instrument they are puzzled over what they observe in San Francisco."

"But I thought you said the Martians knew it all," suggested the Prince of Berkeley.

"I didn't say the Martians knew it all," the Professor rejoined somewhat sharply for him. "I said that the Martians knew more in a week than earth beings could know in a million years. There are many things that the Martians do not know. For one example they do not know how much money James D. Phelan contributed to the graft prosecution or what he expects to get if Rudolph Spreckels gets control of the municipal administration. Ask an entomologist why a pismire shakes hands with every ant he meets on the high road. Do any of you know why a dog turns round before he lies down? Well, even the wisest of the Martian scientists hasn't been able to find out why Judge Dunne has taken such a sudden liking for Judge Lawlor. They know why birds of a feather flock together but they have been unable to fathom the depths of Professor Boke's ignorance of the law. Neither have they discovered why William H. Langdon is still called the District Attorney of San Francisco. The Martians are very wise in the vast things but they are sometimes at a loss to understand the meaning of the little things. An astronomer of this earth knows that light traveling at the speed of 186,000 miles in a second will reach the nearest fixed star in about 700 years; but the man at the microscope doesn't know the constituent elements of an atom. E. P. E. Troy would be invisible to a Martian; and if the most powerful microscopic mentality of a Martian could discover E. P. E. Troy he wouldn't be able to classify it accurately."

"Come along, Professor, time to lock up."

And my friend Professor Erasmus Hochstadter, M. A., D. S., F. R. A. S., arose and followed the interne to his cell in the harmless ward.

The Three Robes

(From the French of Catulle Mendes)

The beautiful daughter of the King of Mataquin was only fifteen years old, but she was eager to marry her ideal, a handsome young prince. One morning when a maid was combing the beautiful girl's hair, the fairy Holda, who was the princess's godmother decided to gratify her wish. The doors of the chamber were opened as if by magic and there entered six negroes richly dressed and smiling broadly; they were African gnomes and carried three caskets. The caskets were very beautiful,—one of enameled silver, the other of fine gold and the third covered with precious stones.

"Good morning, goddaughter."

"Good morning, godmother."

"Is it true that, impatient as are rosebuds to burst into bloom, you are in a hurry for a husband?"

"It is true that I would have no repugnance to marriage if they should offer me such a husband as I desire; in short, like the young prince who appears to me in my dreams."

"How does this prince look of whom you dream?"

"Ah! You cannot imagine anyone so charming as he!"

"But—"

"First, he is dressed with all the magnificence and taste possible."

"Well dressed princes are not rare in the vicinity."

"He has a ruddy face and lips as fresh and crimson as the rose wet with dew."

"Princes with charming lips are to be found."

"There are such depths of sweetness in his blue eyes, that when you look at them you imagine you see the sky through two transparent sapphires."

"Hm!" said the fairy. "Eyes of this kind are not very common. Fortunately, as I am good and do not wish you to repent of the choice that you make, I will permit you to marry three times. It will be strange if among three husbands you do not find one that suits you perfectly."

"What! Three times?" said the princess, blushing.

"Not in the same day. You will be careful to put proper intervals between your weddings. Besides, although so many marriages are permitted, they are not commanded. Nothing will hinder you from keeping him with whom you are satisfied. But you may make several trials, and that is why I have brought you these three caskets. In the one which is of enameled silver, there is a robe of white satin and lace which you will wear for your first marriage; in the other of gold, there is a toilet of the color of the sun and stars that you may put on to delight the second husband; and the robe for the third nuptials—the most beautiful of the three—is enclosed in the third casket, which is covered with precious stones."

Some time after that the nephew of the Emperor of Golconda came to the court of Mataquin to ask the hand of the king's daughter, whose beauty was renowned throughout the country. Never was there seen a prince so magnificently dressed as this one. Over satins which seemed made of shining snow, over muslins as delicate and rosy as clouds of sunrise, he wore embroideries of pearls, rubies, beryls and carbuncles that glowed like flowers made of flame. The dazzled princess had no objection to wedding the nephew of the Emperor of Golconda. She drew the robe of white satin and lace from the silver casket and arrayed herself happily for the ceremony.

But she soon found that a gorgeous habit will not compensate for a lack of everything else. Her husband, when he was dressed in his morning costume, did not resemble in the least the young lover of her dreams. Where were the deep, tender eyes as blue as the skies? She became more and more morose, staying all day in her chamber, weeping in the corner. So she had the greatest trouble in the world to show suitable grief the day when she learned that the nephew of the Emperor of Golconda, who was a great hunter, had been devoured by lions in the mountains.

When she had worn mourning for about six months she commenced to say to herself that she was not obliged to remain a widow; and she felt her heart touched with tenderness at the sight of a cavalier who had just arrived at court and who had triumphed over all other combatants at a tournament. Not only did this gentleman wear superb garments, but he had a ruddy countenance and crimson lips like rosebuds dipped in dew. The princess could not contain her joy when she learned that the cavalier intended to marry her, and she readily consented to this new alliance. She drew from the casket of fine gold the robe which was the color of the sun and stars and dressed herself in it delightedly for the ceremony.

But she soon found—notwithstanding the sweetness of his kisses—that simply to be well dressed and to have a mouth as sweet as a flower was not sufficient to make the happiness of so exacting a young woman as she was. No, this husband was not he who had appeared to her in her charming dream; he had not sweet blue eyes like transparent sapphires. She sorrowed day and night, unhappy at the lack of all she had imagined, and it required a great effort not to smile through her tears the day they told her that the cavalier, who was a great adventurer, had been killed by a wicked magician in an enchanted forest.

A year passed before the princess thought of another marriage. The first two attempts had been too painful for her to wish for the third; she said to herself that she would never find a husband like him who appeared to her in her dreams, and she fell into melancholy reverie. But one evening, as she walked in the royal park, she saw coming toward her through the twilight a young man more beautiful than any she had ever seen. Was it a mortal, or an angel descended from paradise? He seemed to be dressed in starlight; his mouth was like a rose, but a rose so beautiful she could never find one like it in any earthly garden, and when he came near her there were such depths of infinite sweetness in his deep blue eyes that she thought she could see the sky through two transparent sapphires. Ah, at last! She had found the husband she had longed for! He was there like the delicious apparition of her dreams, and when he said to her in a voice sweeter than the sighing wind that blows over the stream: "Beautiful princess, will you be my wife?" she was so overcome with delightful languor that she felt as if she were dying of happiness.

The day of the nuptial ceremony she opened the last casket, which was of precious stones, and drew out the robe for the third wedding, the most beautiful of all.

But there was a strange robe in the casket—a robe that was a shroud.

Then the princess began to weep, comprehending that the moment of death had come. Taken with a sudden illness, her spirit left her before nightfall. They wrapped her in the shroud and laid her in the casket of precious stones. For no one can possess here below the realization of his dreams, and not upon earth do princesses marry princes who have at once magnificent garments, lips like flowers and eyes in which smile the infinite blue of Heaven.

Madera Corrects the Manners of the Metropolis

Judge Conley of Madera, who has been sitting in Judge Dunne's court trying James Treadwell for wrecking the California Safe Deposit and Trust Co., is an interesting individual, who confesses to being a "Rube." "I've always lived in the country," he says, "and the noise of the street cars keeps me awake; and dodging them keeps me busy whenever I'm out." But in spite of the hayseed in his hair, Judge Conley is on the job every minute, as the attorneys have found out. Thomas Dozier for the defence and William Hoff Cook for the prosecution, started a wrangle in court the other day. They had been at it about ten seconds, and were just launching into a choice line of sarcasm when Conley interrupted: "Gentlemen," he said, "there can be no more of this—absolutely no more. If there's any further trouble I'll take a hand in it—and it's a hundred to one shot that I'll come out best in the mixup." Judge Conley was smiling all the time he said this—but the smile was not of the reassuring kind, and the attorneys became as meek as Judge Lawlor is during a Heney tirade. It's not nice of Judge Conley to come into this parish and set such a precedent. It is easy to see that he is not in touch with court procedure here. He does not know that attorneys are privileged to roar and rant to their hearts' content, and that the dignity of the court is the last thing to be considered—in fact, that the court has no dignity.

The Poster Prize Winner

Randall Borough, who drew the poster that was selected by the Portola Committee as the prize winner, is a well known local illustrator. He is a Stanford man. He studied art and drawing for the Chapparal while at college. After graduating he worked for a time on the Evening Post, was in the commercial art business for a time, and is now illustrator for a morning paper, attracting considerable attention through his drawings of stage celebrities. Borough's work has a clean finish, and plenty of life and spirit. It was because of the "go" in his poster that it was awarded the prize, Virgil Nahl being a close second with a drawing that had too much repose in it. Tens of thousands of copies will be made of Borough's poster and scattered all over the world, so that he will win more fame through it than usually falls to the lot of a newspaper illustrator. And if it should land him a better job somewhere no one would be sorry, as he is well liked among his fellows.

Justin Gaged—Good evening, Freddy. Do you know who I am?

Freddy (aged seven)—Yes; mama said you were sister Clara's last hope!

The Sutro Trust

The city of San Francisco does not suffer any great loss, as is generally supposed, as a result of the decision of the Supreme Court pronouncing the Sutro trust invalid. If the trust had been sustained the city would some day in the years to come have the privilege of buying Sutro Heights at public auction for twenty per cent less than the highest bid. This prospective privilege is what the city has lost. Sutro made his will sixteen years before his death, at a time when he believed himself very wealthy. He made numerous bequests to relatives and friends, but to his children he left only $10,000 each together with the residue from which he expressly excluded the vast tracts of land which he attempted to tie up in the trust. Between the date of the will and the date of his death he sold several of the choicest pieces of his real estate and used the proceeds in building the Sutro railway and Sutro Baths. As a consequence at the time of his death he was land poor. Over eight hundred acres of land in this city, most of which is unimproved, were tied up in the so-called "Charitable Trust," the purpose of which was to perpetuate the name of Sutro. He directed that not a foot of this property should be sold until the date of the death of the last of his six children. He further directed that the proceeds of the sale should be devoted to "such charities, institutions of learning and science and for premiums to be set apart for distinguished scholarships and scientific discoveries and inventions," as should be designated by his executors three years after his death. In other words the executors were to designate, three years after his death, the objects to which the enormous proceeds of the sale of his property should be devoted in the neighborhood of a half century later.

He Provided for Prize Essays

To enable his executors to make wise selections Sutro provided that advertisements should be published in three of the leading papers of San Francisco, New York and London, calling for treatises on the subject of the application and management of the funds, and that prizes of $1,500, $1,000 and $500 should be offered for the best essays. The Board of Trustees which was to administer the funds was to be a somewhat imposing institution. It was to be composed of the Governor of the State, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the Presiding Judge of the Superior Court of San Francisco, the United States Circuit Judge for California, the Mayor of San Francisco, the President of the Chamber of Commerce, the President of the Board of Regents of the State University and six other members to be elected. Three of these six were to be chosen from among the leading bankers of this city and the other three from among "my male descendants or those of my brothers bearing the name of Sutro." The trust was held invalid by Judge Troutt in 1899, by Judge Coffey in 1906 and by the Supreme Court in the decision handed down last week.

His Children

Sutro left six children—two sons and four daughters. The sons, Edgar and Charles W. Sutro are residents of this city. All of the daughters were married at the time of their father's death. Kate Sutro is the wife of Moritz Nussbaum, a professor of anatomy in the University of Bonn, Germany. Clara Sutro is the wife of William J. English, an attorney, formerly of Chicago. Rosa Sutro is the wife of Pio Morbio of Berkeley. Emma Sutro is the wife of Dr. Charles W. Merritt. She is the executrix of the will and did not join in the attack on the trust. Aside from the bequest of ten thousand to each of the children they have received very little money from the estate and it is said that some of them have been in straitened circumstances. The contest which has brought wealth to all of them was conducted by Garrett McEnerney and Charles S. Wheeler.

A Real "Yellow Peril"

So Kang Yu-wei has been granted amnesty by the imperial government of China. That is good news for the fugitive patriot and I believe it is good news for China. It indicates that the reactionaries have lost their hold on the state council of Peking and that a liberal, almost democratic policy will hereafter be adopted in the administration of the affairs of the Middle Kingdom. Kang Yu-wei represents the party of radical reform. His recall probably places a blanket amnesty over the Hukwang provinces—Kwang-tung and Kwang-si—a veritable hotbed of rebellion against the Manchu usurper.

THE CARNEGIES

This is the first photograph ever published of the wife of the Laird of Skibo.

This action is also indicative of the settled determination of the new dynasty to modernize the political and educational system of China. Western learning will be substituted for the ancient "classics"; the army will be reconstructed upon Western methods; a navy will be organized and efficiently equipped; foreign enterprise will be encouraged; the commerce of the nation will be enlarged; the monetary system will be revised; and China will take her place among the nations as a competitor and a power. The recall of Kang Yu-wei is probably preliminary to the recall of Yuan Shi-kai, formerly viceroy of Shan-tung, dismissed from his position as grand councillor immediately after the deaths of the Empress Dowager and the Emperor because his policy did not accord with the purposes of the conservative element of the imperial party and the reactionary politicians then striving to control the administration under the new dynasty. Evidently these politicians and statesmen have been ousted from power and the destinies of China are, temporarily at least, in the hands of the progressives. What this "awakening" means for the rest of the world time will reveal. A little while ago we were talking of the "yellow peril." It is my opinion that the "yellow peril" is more imminent at this moment than at any time since China was roused from the lethargy of her slumbering centuries by the allied armies that suppressed the Boxer rebellion. As long as the covert policy of the Dowager was the moving force in Chinese politics the world had nothing to fear. All that China then asked was to be let alone; and the only "peril" was to the foreigners in China who were seeking to subvert the laws and the religion of the country and to loot the empire from vast "concessions" secured by corrupt bargains with corrupt public officials. Now it is different. Foreign capital is to be invited to exploit the cheap labor of 400,000,000 people, and the product of this labor will compete in the markets of the world with the product of white laborers even against the highest tariff wall that can be erected to bulwark the nations against the on rushing tide of Chinese manufactures financed and directed by European and American capital and energy.

Upsetting an Emperor

Kang Yu-wei was the leader of the reform movement that organized in northern China in 1898. He was the most eminent of the twelve advisers clustered around the emperor. He was the soul and brains of the great conspiracy that threatened to overturn the established order in the Middle Kingdom. For a time the conservatives at the imperial court were content to let matters take their course, confident that the yellow dowager could destroy in an hour the fabric that the reformers were raising so laboriously. This confidence was more than justified. The old dragon smashed the reform program in less than fifteen minutes after her hasty recall from the summer palace at the urgent demand of Yung-lu the prime minister. It is said that the old woman did not pause to remove her traveling robe, but strode through the great audience hall of the yellow palace to where her nephew was seated, yanked him from his throne, dragged him to an inner chamber and there spanked him soundly. Probably this is merely an idle tale of the palace gossips; but it is an historical fact that when the emperor again mounted the throne after his private interview with his aunt, he handed down his abdication to the president of the State Council and Tsi An was supreme and absolute over the most populous empire on the face of the earth.

A Fugitive Patriot

It was a few moments past the hour of the dog, which is midnight in Peking, when there came a sharp summons at the door of Kang Yu-wei, in the street of the mad priest just west of the Hatamon, the great thoroughfare that cuts the Tartar city into two unequal parts from the south gate to the five-storied pagoda over against the great temple of the lamas. "Who knocks!" cried the statesman. "A messenger in haste from his majesty," was the answer. "What is the imperial will?" demanded Kang Yu-wei. "That you fly on the instant or suffer death at the hands of your enemies and the enemies of his majesty," was the answer—and after that only the weird cry of the watchman going his rounds broke the silence of the city. Kang Yu-wei understood and obeyed. How he passed the Hatamon tower and escaped byond the walls through the two iron-barred gates is not related in the story of this famous flight, but it is known that the man who would have liberated the empire from the death clutch of the usurping Manchu went down the Pei-ho in a junk, that he boarded a British gunboat in the Taku roadstead, and that he transferred to a British cruiser at Shanghai which brought him to safety at Hongkong. Since that memorable night in April, 1898, Kang Yu-wei has been a fugitive on the face of the earth, for the arm of the yellow dowager was long and her hatred eternal. From Hongkong to Bombay went Kang Yu-wei always just beyond the reach of the assassins who, with dagger, pistol, poison and rope sought his life to win the price on his head. Thence to Europe and to America the fugitive dodged and shifted and turned again on his tracks to escape the eager emissaries of the implacable dowager. The reward offered by the imperial government for the death of Kang Yu-wei was the largest ever proclaimed by any government for a political refugee—$500,000. This reward was placarded in every city of the world where Chinese abide—it was conspicuous on the dead walls of the Chinese quarter of San Francisco, and it attracted crowds of Chinese throughout the littoral of the Straits Settlements and in the cities and villages of the Eastern Railway from Newchwang to Urga in Mongolia. In Canton where the rebellion was chronic and where a million men were ready to march on Peking when the word should be given by the central revolutionary committee, the great red "edict" had not appeared twenty-four hours before another was posted beside it, from Shameen to the City of the Dead, proclaiming that whoever should cut the throat of the empress dowager should receive (for his surviving family) a million dollars. Let it is said that the Chinese have no sense of humor. Now Kang Yu-wei is going back to Peking under a complete amnesty. China is fast "awakening."

Heads on the Outward Walls

The messenger that gave warning to Kang Yu-wei attempted to perform the same service for the other "conspirators"; but he arrived too late. The runners of the yellow empress were there in each instance before him. If the emperor had had twelve messengers he might have saved all his friends, but like Leonidas of Thermopylae he had but one. They passed through the Chin-chih gate to their doom and their heads were hung against the gray walls of the capital as warning to all rebels and as a trophy to the hatred of the wickedest and most vindictive sovereign that ever sat on a throne.

The Gallant Dunphy

For Jimmy Dunphy, son of the millionaire cattle-king, there is always but a brief interval between the frying-pan and the fire. His matrimonial experiences have been in the nature of a continuous performance. His first venture occurred when he was in the twenties, and he is now far advanced in the idle forties. His first marriage was the culmination of an elopement. A San Rafael justice of the peace tied the knot. Dunphy Sr. was alive in those days, and being a great stickler for the religious proprieties he compelled his son to have his marriage solemnized in church. But the religious ceremony was not at all binding on Jimmy. Some years later he fell in love with a girl who fell into a state of coma in which she lingered for several years baffling medical science which never accounted for her condition. Not long after her death Dunphy married the woman from whom he was recently separated and then came his marriage with "Dodie" Valencia-Baird which he now wishes to have annulled on the ground that he was not in his sober senses when the ceremony was performed. As a matter of fact there is little difference between Dunphy in his sober senses and Dunphy full to overflowing. He has been regarded as an irresponsible individual all his life. His father, sensible of the fact that he was a weakling disposed of his estate in a way that barred Jimmy from any hand in the management. Since his father's death he has had to depend on his mother for funds.

Injustice to Patriots

Is it possible that retribution may sometimes overtake even the just in the midst of their righteous activities? Certain it is that something unpleasant has overtaken our immaculate civic patriots. Unfettered by the most rudimentary principles of honor, it appears that their righteous zeal has hurried them beyond the limits of prudence. They thought that they could do to a whole community precisely what they have been doing to individuals, and they have brought upon themselves a storm of derision. Now in my opinion there is much to be said in extenuation of the imbecility of our civic patriots. These men are not to be measured by ordinary standards, nor their acts calculated by any ordinary computation. They have been encouraged by an indulgent and enraptured community in their wildest aberrations and most lawless eccentricities. It has always been enough for them to say that what they were doing was for the greater good. When they extended their spy system to the people of ployed the camera to catch a woman in sin that she might be blackmailed into co-operating with them for the greater good. So it is evident that in trying to trap all their fellow-citizens as they would a crooked supervisor they merely followed the bent of inclinations which have been deemed heaven-born, perfect and blameless. Consequently it is somewhat in the nature of cant for the dear people to denounce the perpetrators of the stamp act.

The Heney Club

My attention has been called to the fact that there are several lawyers in the Francis J. Heney Club. It is not hard to account for the devotion of these members of the profession to Mr. Heney's political interests. Indeed it is somewhat interesting to go down the membership list of the Heney Club and account for the flocking together of such a large variety of birds in this curious political aviary. For example, on the campagin committee is William J. Ruddick. Not hard to account for him. Mr. Ruddick and Mr. Heney are related by marriage. On the finance committee is John T. Fogarty. Here we have a Phelan henchman, an associate of Rolla V. Watt's in business. Then comes Professor Bunnell of the League of Justice; Dr. Clinton of the Phelan machine who earned a job at the City Hall by raising a memorable row in the Olympic Club; Jeremiah Deasy who needs no introduction; Edward R. Dille, the handy preacher; Dr. Moffitt, brother-in-law of Spreckels; Charles S. Wheeler, the permanently retained attorney of the man with the leg; Joseph J. Dwyer, temporarily attached to the leg; Henry Eickhoff, one of the old Sullivan-Dwyer political machine. If space would permit I could go through the entire list and establish the connection between each member and the inspiration of his membership. The Phelan-Spreckels cabal makes a terrible noise but it's produced by a single bellows. As to the attorneys in the Heney Club their membership is conclusive of their confidence in the higher courts. The Eickhoffs, the Dwyers and the Wheelers are all aware of the fact that Heney and his fellow conspirators have slandered our appellate courts and sought by venomous misrepresentation to blacken the character of judges of the highest integrity. Now these lawyers must be of the opinion that our appellate judges are so conscientious, so inflexible in their administration of the law that they cannot be swayed even by personal prejudice. Else these lawyers would not dare to identify themselves with the scurrilous propaganda which Francis J. Heney conducts at the behest of Rudolph Spreckels. If our appellate judges were guided by passion rather than by law and gave reign to the baser instincts of human nature or to the ordinary impulses of undisciplined minds, it would be extremely hazardous for the Eickhoffs, the Wheelers and the Dwyers to encourage the malevolence of a Heney; they would fare so badly in their practice that they would soon be without clients. But the Eickhoffs, the Wheelers and the Dwyers know that it is absolutely safe for them to avail themselves of the benefits of this discreditable alliance.

Jimmy the Prophet

Since our Supreme Court pronounced the primary election law valid I have heard nothing from the gentlemen who, a few weeks ago, were going about prognosticating a decision the reverse of the one that was rendered. Have the prognosticators who were reviling the Justices of the Supreme Court on the strength of the grapevine information that they had received nothing to say at this time? Where is that shrinking violet the Hon. James

Duval Phelan at this time? But a few short weeks ago this ingenious inventor of cabalistic traps was preening himself on having had access to the leak which supplied him with inside dope straight from the paddock. In his favorite club he named the judge that was writing the decision and about the same time his longest leased journal was preparing for an assault on the State's highest tribunal. Now it appears that Jimmy's dope was all wrong. He probably had his ear glued to the wrong keyhole. Somebody handed Jimmy a "package."

Too Much Literature (?)

It is seriously proposed in London that novelists and publishers take a year's rest, so overstocked is the fiction market. Publishers and booksellers find themselves with thousands of unsold volumes on their hands—especially volumes at the standard price, which is $1.44 in London as $1.50 is the price here. This has been brought about by bargain sales of cheap reprints to sell at 14 cents, completely knocking the bottom out of the market. So it is thought that if the novelists would refrain from writing and the publishers from publishing, the public would within a year have caught up and be clamorously demanding more. The plan might work—but a far better idea would be to establish a novel censorship and limit the product by setting a standard of merit. Let Hewlett, Kipling, Snaith, Locke, and a few others keep on writing and make the lesser breeds take up hard work. With only a few books produced a good price could be maintained—and with nothing but good literature on sale the public might begin to dip into it and thus undergo an intellectual advance that they will never achieve as long as the present indiscriminate writing and publishing is the rule. Such an innovation would be easier in this country than in England—(and is far more needful, by the way)—for if people can be prevented by law from indulging in whisky and cigarettes they certainly can be kept from reading trash. What a scattering there would be at Carmel-by-the-Sea; what a howl from the Women's Press Association; what hideous wails would go up from the various mutual admiration societies that exist under the name of literary clubs! It would be a cruel thing to do—but the good of the community comes first.

American Trash

By this time the patriotic American reader of these words is doubtless taking me to task for the parenthetical aside to the effect that this country needs a censorship even worse than Great Britain does. But it is a lamentable fact. Where can we find on this side of the Atlantic such an array of writers as I mentioned in the preceding paragraph? We have no stylist who can compare with Maurice Hewlett, weaver of wonderful pages in which the words are glowing and colorful—unless it be Mary Austin, whose "Isidro" contains descriptive passages that are wonderful in their complete sympathy with nature, in their delicate and inspiring imagery. But imagination and romanticism—Hewlett is monarch there. Who have we that equals Locke in delicate humor as revealed in "The Morals of Marcus Ordeyne" and "The Beloved Vagabond"—who that can print everyday life as Snaith and Hardy can? Nearly all of those of our novelists who do not write absolute trash are lacking in the finish, in the sure touch that the English writers have. Edith Wharton has it—but she is only one of hundreds. Howells, despite his great talent, falls short of producing what in the highest sense may be termed literature. Our newest writer, Ingraham Lovell, whose novel, "Margarita's Soul," is running in the American magazine, gives great promise—but he may not be an American; literary gossip has not yet divulged just who he is. But he has a beautiful discursive style showing a most likeable personality—something on the William de Morgan order, but without the errors in syntax and rhetoric that mar de Morgan's otherwise wonderful pages. No, it cannot be gainsaid that we are more in need of a censor than England is. A Dedicatory Banquet on the Cliff

Once again lights are gleaming on the Cliff and the laughter of merry-makers rings out once more over the waters that foam and roar against the old grey precipice. The new Cliff House was formally dedicated to the goddess of pleasure last Tuesday night at a banquet given by Jack Tait to about one hundred congenial spirits representative of officialdom, clubdom, journalism and the arts. At the banquet board were men who could spin reminiscences of other days on the Cliff, when San Francisco was in its infancy and the first Cliff House was reached by train over the Point Lobos road. There were some that knew Cliff House No. 2 and that delighted in reviving recollections of the brand of gayety that was there stimulated, but all agreed that Cliff House No. 3 far surpassed its predecessors in achitectural beauty. in the sumptuousness and taste of its appointments and in the character and quality of the hospitality dispensed by the new management. Nothing but the old atmosphere and the seals remain to remind one of other days on the Cliff. Certainly no Cliff House chef ever achieved so great a triumph as the one that excited the raptures of the epicures that assembled on the rock last Tuesday night.

Galicia on Guatemala

An article which appeared in a contemporary recently, in which the writer referred to the Central American republics in terms far from flattering and designated the inhabitants as "semi-savages," aroused the indignation of Senor Salvator M. Galicia, secretary to the dean of the consular corps of San Francisco, who, in an interview, gave a few facts which should go far towards shedding light on real conditions. Senor Galicia reminded his listener that the history of the region now known to us as Central America revealed a high degree of civilization for hundreds of years previous to the invasion of the Spaniards with their army of conquest. "Take Guatemala as an instance," said he. "The Guatemala of today was, centuries ago, the centre of the Quiche nation, a people of high ability. Besides what is now Guatemala they occupied that part of southern Mexico called Chiapas and Tabasco. They ruled with undisputed power for centuries, and gradually became merged with the Toltecs, who came from farther north and founded that empire which was to dazzle the intruding conquerors under Don Pedro de Alvarado, the lieutenant of Hernando Cortez, then in Mexico, who had heard of the splendors of its court. These early natives had a knowledge of art, science and literature. Their language, though without varied inflections, was expressive, and their knowledge of mathematics and astronomy was so advanced that they had worked out a calendar which has been the wonder of the scientific world." Continuing the history, Senor Galicia said: "Don Pedro de Alvarado, having conquered the Quiches, established the capital of the new colony in a valley at the foot of two imposing volcanoes, founding on July 25, 1524, a city under the imposing name of Santiago de los Caballeros de Guatemala. About twenty years later there was an earthquake accompanied by an eruption of mud and water from one of the volcanoes and the city was utterly obliterated. The survivors established a successor at a site about a mile distant. This new city flourished from the first. Building was rapid, and in a little while it became the second city in size on the American continent, and the capital of the province of Guatemala, Chiapas, Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua and Costa Rica, with a population numbering eighty thousand. There were universities, temples with convents attached, hospitals and other institutions which are erroneously assumed to be of purely modern conception. The palaces of the king, of the Captains-General and the Archbishops lacked none of the splendors of corresponding establishments in Europe. The upper classes were already celebrated for their culture, and there was every reason to assume that the city would endure for ages. But about two hundred and thirty years after its foundation there was another visitation of calamity. A volcanic convulsion leveled to the ground in one minute the work of the centuries. About 1773 the third capital was founded, the present city of Guatemala. After the two former experiences the people, having garnered wisdom, deserted the volcanic zone and selected the beautiful valley of La Ermita, with its evergreen hills, its balmy climate and its air of perpetual spring. Guatemala remained a colony of Spain until 1821, when the yoke was thrown off. In 1823 it became an independent republic." So far from being illiterate and degenerate semi-savages, according to Senor Galicia who speaks with pride of the attainments of his countrymen, they are a cultured people fond of literature, art and science. Education with them is one of the important considerations and under the administration of President Estrada Cabrera it has made rapid strides. The universities and other educational institutions turn out able professional men and artists many of whom have achieved international fame. Railroad building is both popular and progressive and on the completion of a line in January of last year Guatemala became one of the only three Spanish American countries that can boast of a transcontinental line. The Fifth Pan American Medical Congress held its last session in Guatemala city a short time ago, and the delegates, several of them from the United States, left with the best opinion of the resources and energies of the country and its people. Senor Galicia takes pride in quoting the remarks of Admiral Swinburne, U. S. N., who made a call of courtesy at Guatemala last March. "I never had four such days of pleasure in my life," said he. "We were entertained a great deal and among the events enjoyed the most were the exercises of the school children at the Palace of Minerva. The two balls given in our honor left nothing to be desired." Another source of pride to Senor Galicia is the fact that Guatemala was the first nation that ever abolished slavery by national act and without the shedding of blood.

The Heathen and the Girl

The Sigel tragedy which is convulsing New York is one more exemplification of the idiocy of the Occidental mind attempting to judge the Oriental by itself. The assumption is always that the charming girl of Caucasian birth and training exerts such a refining and ennobling influence over all who come under her sway that nature itself is modified, while the ugly fact is that to the Oriental mind, be it Chinese, Turk or Arab, the harem is the ideal and the veiled woman the only one to whom they accord even an outward show of respect. The leopard does not change his spots. Marmaduke Pickthall, the Oriental traveler and linguist has warned women of other nationalities that they cannot be too careful in even the minutest particulars, for their guides and dragomans interpret the informal chats and slight familiarities which Americans and Europeans unconsciously permit because they do not understand, as encouragements, and if women or their male companions could comprehend the conversations carried on by horse boys and camel drivers, based on their own interpretations, there would be bloodshed. Years ago when domestic service on the Pacific Coast was almost entirely in the hands of the Chinese, and women frequently assumed that the race they considered their inferiors was void of understanding, many a mistress received a sharp lesson before she became convinced that Chang or Lee, admirable machine though he was, was likewise something more, and that if she expected him to keep his place in the economy of the household it behooved her to be extremely careful of her own. A colony of religious New Englanders, bent on Christianizing the natives and teaching by example once settled themselves in the East, their women going unveiled and associating in democratic equality with the men as they were accustomed to do at home, but instead of inspiring the Arabs with admiration, they created only disgust and eventually the minute settlement was wiped out, it being regarded much as the same pious folk would have looked upon a section of the tenderloin transplanted to their own residential vicinity.

The Romance Oriental

The Oriental love story as we know it is written for the most part by the Occidental sojourner who imbibes "local color" and imagines his characters to be moved by the same impulses which would influence his own people while, as a matter of fact, they attach no such importance to love. Indeed it is said that there is in the Chinese literature only one pure love story, the one pictured on the Canton ware familiarly known as the "Willow pattern." We have had numerous so-called romances between Chinese and Americans, but the less said about them the better. Chinese students educated in American colleges have married daughters of the collegiate aristocracy, only to end up in the divorce court where the commonplace privilege of the Oriental has been construed as cruelty to the Occiental. It is the opinion of those best qualified to judge that the number of Orientals who have been converted to Christianity by any means whatever is too insignificant to be considered, and assuredly in no instance has it been accomplished by the ministrations of ill-regulated young girls who have lowered themselves in the eyes of their catechumens to a depth beneath their contempt. There is nothing so destructive to theories as plain facts, and the East is learning, as the West learned long ago, that the Oriental in the flesh, and the brocaded mandarin pictured on porcelain are very far apart indeed, though not farther than either is from our own race.

The End of Bromley

George Tisdale Bromley, "Uncle George" of the Bohemian Club and all San Francisco, passed away at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Mary Smith, early Wednesday morning. For some time past he has been gradually sinking under the infirmities of age, and though he has occasionally rallied, it was evident that the end was not far off. "Uncle George" was born in Norwich,

"UNCLE GEORGE" BROMLEY

The High Priest of Bohemia who died this week.

Connecticut, in 1817, and had passed his ninety-second birthday. A few years ago, with an unimpaired memory, he compiled a book of his recollections which carried him back from the age of electrical illumination to that of home-made candles and the primitive flint and steel, During his long career he had been engaged in every variety of occupation, from sailor before the mast to diplomatic representative. He was the first conductor on the first railroad in California and an honorary member of all the railroad employees' associations. In his active years he was more or less identified with the political life of the city as well as with commercial enterprises, and almost from its organization he was a prominent figure in the Bohemian Club. Mr. Bromley came to San Francisco in 1850 to take a position in the Custom House, and California was his home from that date. On the morning of the calamity three years ago he was to have started on a trip to the east. The trip was, of course, abandoned, and the veteran pioneer announced that he had no intention of leaving San Francisco but meant to stay and "grow up with the city again." He is survived by four children, thirteen grandchildren and two great-grandchildren.

Thought Influence is Not Christian Science

As Town Talk recently stated there is widespread misapprehension respecting the essentials of Christian Science. Apropos thereof the following is of interest:

"June 21, 1909.

"To the Editor of Town Talk,

"Dear Sir: The article by Dr. Abrams in a recent issue mentions Christian Science as though it were related to systems which rely on the influence of the human mind, yet there is no such relationship, for Christian Science deprecates all attempts at human thought—influence such as belong to mesmerism, hypnotism, and what is known as mental suggestion. It does not dominate or stupefy the patient, but seeks to arouse him to the perception of his freedom and God-given right to health. As a recent editorial in Town Talk clearly pointed out, Christian Science relies upon the power of God, which was the basis of original Christianity; and inasmuch as the effect of its practice is to bring man into an intelligent obedience to divine law it is separated from systems which impose submission to will-power and to the dictates of the human mind.

"Yours sincerely,

"Olcott Haskell."

THE GODS

Last night, as one who hears a tragic jest,
I woke from dreams, half-laughing, half in tears;
Methought that I had journey to the spheres
And stood upon the Planet of the Blest!
And found thereon a folk who played with zest
Exceeding, and through all their painful years,
Like strong souls struggled on, 'mid hopes and fears;
"Where dwell the gods," they said, "we shall find rest."
The gods? What gods, I thought, are these who so Inspire their worshippers with faith that flowers
Immortal, and who make them keep aglow
The flames forever on their alter towers?
"Where dwell these gods of yours?" I ask—and lo!
They pointed upward to this earth of ours.

Should your inclination drift toward fishing, at the Ellery Arms Co. you can find the newest in rods, reels, lines and everything you need from a fish basket to a hook.

Within a few months quails and ducks will be in season, then you may need a new gun, shells, game bag or decoys. Everything can be found at Ellery's. Should your gymnasium at home need a new punching bag you can find the newest ideas at Ellery Arms Co. The have outing and tennis boats and shoes and clothing.

We can hardly enumerate all of the different items to be found in this store so replete in the general outfitting of a man or woman who loves out-of-door life on the golf links in the woods or on the water. They carry pennants for all schools and colleges, megaphones, and also a well equipped assortment of crockery goods, base ball outfits, bathing suits, jerseys and caps and a complete Spauldings athletic library.

There is a large line of Henckel's world renowned cutlery, imported from Germany, a splendid selection of razors from the forges of the old world. In fact there is no market on earth that has not been ransacked by the Ellery Arms Co. to give San Francisco the most completely equipped sporting goods house in the world. Their buyers have visited the different factories in the East and Europe so no patron of the establishment can ask for any modern appliance to enhance the pleasure or practice of high class sport and not find it readily at hand.

Mr. Wm. Ellery, the President, has given his personal attention to the quality of every commodity offered for sale here and warrants it's worth as represented. There are no better goods made is their motto and none more perfect for the purpose manufactured.

Mr. Wm. Ellery is President of the Ellery Arms Co. and also of the San Francisco Kennel Club. He is also owner of the best known prize winning kennel of Scotch Coolie dogs in the country.

Mr. Geo. W. Ellery is Vice-President and Mr. H. C. Peet is Secretary of this company which has become the foremost sporting goods house on this coast. Courteous treatment, reasonable prices and good service is the slogan of the Ellery Arms Co. A visit to the store will interest you.

Disillusioned in an Operating Room

To the amiable busybodies that are always trying to analyze the emotions of others Miss Jennie Crocker is an object of profound interest. They assume that every young man that meets this great heiress is eager to make an impression, and that she herself is waiting patiently for the heart-flutter that will indicate the arrival of her future husband. Several times these busybodies thought that they had detected symptoms of a love affair involving this interesting heiress and straightway they propagated rumors of an impending announcement, but according to latest advices Miss Crocker is still heart whole and fancy free. It is said, however, that but a short time ago she was on the verge of solving her absorbing heart problem. Of course the gossips know all about it. Though none of them that I know of was ever taken into her confidence, nevertheless down in Burlingame the story is told as though it were authoritative that not long ago Miss Crocker had about made up her mind to bestow her affections on a distinguished young surgeon. The story is also told that she changed her mind and the reasons for the change are given along with a wealth of detail. Briefly the story is to the effect that being under treatment for a slight touch of appendicitis it occurred to her that it would be instructive to witness an operation on a vermiform appendix. The young surgeon was consulted and he agreed to provide the spectacle. Not long thereafter he was called upon to operate on a patient and he invited Miss Crocker to the operation. She attended and when it was over she concluded that she didn't want a surgeon for a husband.

The Silent Sisters

Mary Keeney and Katrina Page-Brown have been voted if not the prettiest, the two most quiet girls in society. They smile a good deal, and have a casual word to say now and then but as a whole they do not trouble themselves to keep up a conversation. And in connection with this demureness a good story is being traced to Walter Martin. He was one of the party who visited the Grand Canyon of the Colorado in Jennie Crocker's private car. The other day in speaking of the trip some one remarked on the degree of intimacy that must have sprung up between the various members of the party. In fact so directly were they thrown in contact that it was wondered how they managed to keep from innumerable little squabbles and quarrels. "Did you come back just as good friends—all of you?" Walter Martin was asked. "After seeing so much of each other I should think you would scarcely have been on speaking terms." "We all were, however," replied Walter Martin gravely, "excepting Mary Keeney and Katrina Page-Brown, and to my certain knowledge they have never been on speaking terms with anybody as long as they have lived." Which reminds me that Miss Mary Keeney's birthday dinner was one of the big events of a week ago, and caused more than the usual flutter of excitement since everyone was prepared to have it turn out the medium for announcing her engagement to Reginald Fernald, so there was some disappointment when not a hint was forthcoming. Now society is debating the question, Is she or isn't she? and society is headed by Mrs. Keeney herself in this instance, for she knows as little as Mrs. Grundy. Every day she is interrogated in person or by phone, and all she can answer is "No, Mary won't tell me anything. She just smiles when I ask her."

He's Not of the Navy

When a certain attractive girl recently left for an extended eastern trip there was much speculation and comment as to just which of the visiting navy officers was the lucky man who would eventually win out. As she has always been more or less identified with the navy set it was assumed that from the navy would come the man of her heart. Now from New York comes word that "he" is an army man in the Coast Artillery and that since the evening before her departure she has been wearing a West Point class ring. Her friends here are quite excited; they have heard from her that there is to be no formal announcement just yet, and they are broken hearted, for having been on the look out for the right navy officer they quite overlooked the army and they have absolutely no idea which of the many eligible Presidio bachelors is the lucky one. Moreover her letters give absolutely no satisfaction; she admits the engagement and adds that they will have to wait with what patience they may until her return for all the details. I hear that one of the most fascinating of the army men has forsworn hops and gone into seclusion, and gossip,

Mrs. Silverstone's Suit

It looked, at first glance, as though the skeleton in another family cupboard was about to come forth and pirouette for the edification of the public when Mrs. Eleanor Sophia Silverstone of Milwaukee filed papers in the Superior Court, asking for a distribution of the estate of her mother, the late Eleanor Gray Dimond, who was the widow of General William H. Dimond. There seems to be something contentious in the atmosphere of California, and much as one may regret, there is little of surprise at any action instituted by surviving relatives when money is involved. However, this time, the gossips will be grievously disappointed, for the estate is very small, not over $30,000 in value, and the suit, an entirely friendly one, is solely to determine a point of law, and will probably be submitted on the facts. Mrs. Silverstone, the nominal contestant, is the second daughter of the Dimonds, and a sister of Mrs. Joseph Sadoc Tobin and Harry Dimond. Her first husband was Paul Jarboe, but the union did not prove congenial, and a divorce separated them. The only child, a boy of about twelve now, makes his home with his father and grandmother in San Rafael. Eleanor Dimond's second venture on the stormy sea of matrimony was with Dr. A. Rudolph Silverstone, a millionaire physician and inventor of Milwaukee. She created a flutter of excitement last winter when she was married by a clergyman some eight months after a Wisconsin justice of the peace had already united them. Mrs. Silverstone was closely related to literature by her first marriage, for both Mrs. John R. Jarboe and Mrs. Jerome Case Bull (Katherine Jarboe), are novelists with an assured position, while Jerome Case Bull, likewise a writer, is now editing an eastern magazine.

Married Her Ex-Husband

That facts will discount fiction was never more truly exemplified than in the telegrams which announced to a few intimate friends in this city last week the remarriage of Mrs. Kitty Staples Yeamens and her former husband, Dr. H. C. Yeamens, U. S. A. Twenty years ago Kitty Staples, daughter of the late D. J. Staples, for so many years president of the Fireman's Fund Insurance Company, was married to Dr. H. C. Yeamens, then connected with the United States Marine Hospital. The affair was large and brilliant, as befitted the wedding of a society belle and an eligible suitor, and everyone assumed that they would be at least normally happy and content, but six months after the wedding they were separated, and in due time, divorced. No hint was ever given to the friends of either side as to what had caused the rupture. Dr. Yeamens was transferred to the east, and eventually left the naval service for that of the army. After the divorce Dr. and Mrs. Yeamens went their separate ways. Mrs. Yeamens had two beautiful nieces, Phoebe and Elizabeth Painter, the daughters of her dead sister, to whom she devoted herself. It was not long after they made their social debut that Phoebe Painter was married to Dr. Gardiner Perry Pond, but she died during the first year of their married life. Elizabeth Painter also married, at the end of her first season, George Engelhardt, whose family is of prominence in Victoria, B. C. She, too, died within a few weeks after the birth of her little daughter, and, subsequently, Mr. Engelhardt took the child, now about four years old, to his parents in Victoria. As both the father and mother of Mrs. Yeamens died years ago, she was thus left all alone and desolate. Just after the fire Dr. Yeamens wrote to his former wife, and the correspondence growing out of the calamity continued until a short time ago, when last week Mrs. Yeamens confided to a few personal friends her intention of going east to remain indefinitely. No one had the remotest suspicion of a romantic climax, and it was generally assumed that the object of the change was relieve the loneliness of a life which had been bereft of so much in San Francisco. The first intimation of anything else was conveyed in the telegrams announcing the marriage which took place in Chicago on the day after Mrs. Yeamens' arrival, and giving her future address as Fort Wayne, Michigan, where Dr. Yeamens is stationed.

the championship of England several times besides having decisively beaten all the American women who have matched themselves against her, and as Miss Hotchkiss has just returned from Philadelphia after winning all three of the national championships, the match next Monday may be considered as practically deciding the woman's world championship. Miss Hotchkiss has by far the prettier style, conforming more nearly to the men's stroke than any other woman in America. She is swift and accurate, and has a chop-stroke that has always worried Miss Sutton more than any other style of game. On the other hand, Miss Sutton is today playing better than ever before. She recently defeated her sister Florence without the loss of a single game and, indeed, with the loss of only twelve points in the whole match. She is probably the strongest woman player the world has ever seen. She drives the balls with terrific force and deadly accuracy. Opinions as to the outcome of the match are divided, many experts asserting that if Miss Sutton wins from the clever Berkeley girl it will be at the expense of hard work. In any event the match cannot fail to be intensely interesting, as besides virtually deciding the question of championship it will also determine the possession of two beautiful silver loving cups, one the challenge cup offered by the Pacific Lawn Tennis Association and the other donated by Mr. J. W. Holmes, Manager of the Hotel Rafael. Play will commence sharply at half past two on Monday afternoon.

Bridge by Rail

That bridge, that unfailing pastime of matrons and maids, is not likely to be shoved into the background by summer amusements, was demonstrated not long ago when a party of the younger society girls, including Miss Jennie Crocker and Miss Virginia Jolliffe, whiled away the tediousness of a trip to Del Monte by train. Stakes were fairly high for young women, and it is said that one of the bevy parted with seventeen dollars during the journey without moulting a feather. They were totally oblivious to everyone and everything but the game, and played unceasingly all the way between their terminals.

The Persian Poet at Del Monte

The most interesting visitor to Del Monte during the past week, writes my correspondent, was Mirza Ali Kuli Khan, Imperial Persian Consul at Washington, a distinguished man of letters and what is by no means the same thing, a highly accomplished man. His English is almost without accent, and he is far better acquainted with the best literature and most advanced thought than the majority of educated English speaking people. Under the patronage of Mrs. Francis J. Carolan, Mrs. Phoebe Hearst and other ladies, Mirza Ali Kuli gave a course of lectures on Persian literature last winter which failed to attract audiences not because the subject or its presentation was uninteresting but because of a lack of a sufficient number of persons capable of appreciating it. Mirza Ali Kuli is on a plain, prosaic house-hunting expedition at present, and has been investigating at Monterey Heights, Pacific Grove and Carmel by the Sea, and is so impressed by the splendid beach and grand view at Carmel that it is not improbable he may join the literary colony, though Pacific Grove has its claim also, in greater accessibility. The pleasure of Mirza Ali Kuli's visit to Del Monte was enhanced by his meeting with an English tourist whose nephew, formerly a major in the British army, now an officer in Persia, has written one of the most interesting and accurate books concerning that country which has appeared in the English language. Mirza Ali Kuli, by the way, is married to a Boston lady. They have one child.

She Was Misrepresented

Mrs. Henry Spies Kip who paid us a visit a short time ago, coming down from Reno where she is supposed to be establishing a statutory residence for divorce purposes, is reported to be very indignant at the reporters by whom she was interviewed while here. They quoted her to the effect that she scorned society, believing as she did that it lacked substance, and realizing as she did that it failed to inspire her with high ideals. Now she says that she didn't say these things; that the reporters were guilty of gross misrepresentation.

A Tennis Tournament for Charity

The Hill Farm Sanitarium was the beneficiary of a lively tennis tournament which was held on the San Rafael court last week. Miss Elizabeth Ashe sold the tickets, twenty-five cents for spectators and fifty cents for contestants, and quite a good crowd was assembled. The game continued from nine o'clock in the morning until luncheon at two in the afternoon with sixteen entries. The finals were played by Miss Edith Lowe and John Martin, Miss Winifred Mason and Kenneth Gunn, the latter couple being the victors. Each of the final contestants was presented with a cup by Mrs. J. J. Crooks and Mrs. Charles J. Foster. "Daily," the great tennis sharp, umpired the finals, and altogether it was a great success, the children having cleared over forty dollars. All the posters and the tickets were the work of the youngsters, too.

Gossip From Pacific Grove

Society at Pacific Grove and Monterey has received an addition in the person of Mrs. W. Lawrey Hollenbeck, who was formally introduced at two receptions, held on Friday and Saturday afternoons, June 18th and 19th, at the home of Mrs. B. L. Hollenbeck. Mr. Hollenbeck having recently allied himself with one of the leading business firms of Pacific Grove, the Lawrey Hollenbecks will soon be established in their own pretty home near the shore, purchased for them by Mrs. B. L. Hollenbeck. Mrs. Hollenbeck Sr. went to Pacific Grove from San Jose some fifteen years ago, and is a leader of club and social life. She is the owner of a large amount of real estate there, including several valuable business blocks. Mrs. C. Lee and her family are down at Pacific Grove where they are ensconced in the Emile Bruguiere's place on the Monterey hills. They have their motor with them and are making good use of it. Mr. J. Pasitusky of Oakland with a party, motored down to Pacific Grove last week and after an enjoyable run about the peninsula, proceeded on to the south. G. A. Buell made the trip from the north side of the bay, sixty-one miles, in less than three hours one day last week. Mr. J. Mills, an enthusiastic motorist who recently arrived in San Francisco from Florida, is down at Pacific Grove with his family. Amongst prominent visitors to Pacific Grove last week were Admiral Whiting, Mrs. Whiting and Dr. Farenholt, U. S. N. They were entertained by Mrs. Jacques Loeb. Professor and Mrs. F. L. Heath, Santa Cruz artists, have been sketching for a week in and around the Grove. Mrs. I. M. Miller Jr. and her mother, Mrs. R. S. Austin of Oakland are spending the summer, and Mrs. Theodore E. Smith, prominent in social and church circles in San Francisco a few years ago, is located at 115 Forest avenue.

The Sloss-Ackerman Wedding

One of the prettiest weddings of the season was celebrated in San Rafael last week, when Miss Louise Sloss was united to Lloyd Ackerman. It was a perfect day, and the marriage service was read by Judge M. C. Sloss, uncle of the bride, under the spreading trees which shade the lawn of the family residence. An altar of orange trees in full bloom, Bermuda lilies and white and pink roses was appropriately picturesque. The bride's attendant was Miss Sarah Lilienthal, while the groom was supported by Walter Frowenfel. The flower bearers were Leon Sloss Jr., Richard Sloss and Marguerite Sloss, the children of Judge Sloss, Edgar Goldstein and Florence Ackerman. An elaborate breakfast was served at small tables arranged on the lawn. After an extended wedding tour the Ackermans will return to reside in San Francisco.

The Motor Club at Paraiso

The first annual run of the San Francisco Motor Club was made to Paraiso Springs last Friday, Saturday and Sunday, a distance of about a hundred and fifty-six miles each way over the best roads in the State, and the seventy-five members who participated in the trip are enthusiastic over every aspect of the outing. Manager McGowan outdid even his own splendid reputation as a host. Everything at the springs was turned over to his guests free of expense and the big bulls' head breakfast and barbecue of Saturday was enjoyed for both excellence and novelty. There were about four hours devoted to the big swimming tank, enlivened by water polo, base ball, follow the leader and every other form of aquatic sport, and the handsome new dancing pavilion was dedicated by a ball on Saturday evening. Tramping parties wandered over the hills, and there was no form of extracting pleasure from out door life that was not enjoyed. The trip from San Francisco was made via San Jose, over San Juan Hill and through Salinas. On the return several members of the party journeyed to Del Monte and Santa Cruz. Among those who attended the run were Wm. R. Johnston and wife and party, Mr. Thomas Hart, F. A. Marriott and wife and party, A. F. Tynan, M. McGlinchey, Wm. John and wife and party, J. W. Leavitt and wife, W. W. Bishop, H. M. Owens and wife and party, P. F. Courneau, Fernando Nelson and wife and party, E. S. Swift, H. Owensney and wife, R. T. Lyons and wife, J. D. McCarthy and wife and party, Mrs. C. M. Hansen, Miss Minnie Hansen, Miss Anna Hansen, Mrs. E. L. Frico, Mrs. J. M. Marcovick, W. A. Breen, E. C. Foley, W. E. Duzan and wife, Al. Gallagher-Marsh Business College

1256 Market St. (Below Larkin) San Francisco

THIS IN THE BUSINESS COLLEGE recommended and patronized by the experts. For instance: Mr. Clement Bennett, the Official Reporter of the United States Courts, and Mr. Earnest A. Girvin, ex-official reporter of the Supreme Court, sent their boys here. Mr. Frank Shay of the Southern Pacific Law Office, who was one of the old time court reporters, also sent his boy here.

THIS IS THE BUSINESS COLLEGE that graduated Walter Trefts, Judge Shortall's court reporter; Roy Gallagher, Judge Graham's court reporter, and Frank Hart, who was Judge Hebbard's court reporter, and other expert stenographers too numerous to mention.

THIS IS THE BUSINESS COLLEGE from which was graduated Ruth Ohlson, 14 years old, the fastest shorthand writer in the world of her age, and who is employed now at the highest salary paid to any person her age in the U. S. by any commercial concern for stenographic or clerical services.

There is not a stenographer in this city able to write 125 words per minute for three consecutive minutes and type the same at 50 words per minute, earning less than $75 per month. If you expect such a position, attend a school capable of placing you in that class. Parents should not trifle with the future career of their children by sending them to some inferior school, but should follow the advice of the experts and have them attend Gallagher-Marsh Business College, the most practical business college on the Pacific Coast.

THIS IS THE BUSINESS COLLEGE patronized by the thinking classes—by those persons who pay attention to genuine recommendations from the experts. Send for catalogue and read what the experts say about this business college before going elsewhere.

You owe it as a duty to your children who contemplate taking a business course to pay at least one visit to this school, witness the advanced class, consisting of students from 15 to 17 years of age, write over 150 words per minute and read the same back correctly, and see for yourselves why all the experts of San Francisco and vicinity recommend this school.

In the Social Spotlight

Mr. and Mrs. Howard E. Huntington, Mrs. M. A. Huntington, Miss Huntington and Mrs. Davenport motored to Aetna Springs last week.

Mrs. C. M. Belshaw entertained Mrs. W. Shotwell, Mrs. J. B. Wright and Mrs. E. A. Bresse at Aetna Springs.

Mr. and Mrs. D. T. Murphy and Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Pope were at Aetna Springs for the week-end.

Miss Isabel Hemmenway and Dr. Charles J. Stevens were quietly married last week and left immediately on a wedding tour which will last several weeks. Dr. Stevens is a dentist, a brother of Dr. W. B. Stevens, the physician and surgeon. The Stephens come from Paris, Kentucky, and have resided in California but a short time. They are relatives of Mrs. S. F. Lieb of San Jose and Dr. John Grissam of Oakland.

Miss Alice Downing of Oakland surprised all her friends by her marriage in Los Angeles on June 14th to Merrit Robertson. The wedding was scheduled to take place in Oakland later in the month, and when Miss Downing left for a visit to Southern California a short while ago no one had a suspicion that she meant to anticipate the date. The Robertsons are now occupying apartments in this city, but later they will spend a part of the summer with the Downings in East Oakland.

Miss Marie Wainwright, now with Marie Doro at the Van Ness Theatre, is a member of the old Southern aristocracy. She is a granddaughter of Bishop Wainwright, and grandmother was a Miss Page of the Pagebrook farm of history. When she was a very young girl Miss Wainwright escaped from her convent school and eloped with a son of Bishop Slaughter of New York. There were two or three children resultant from the marriage, but it ended in the divorce court. Later Miss Wainwright was married to Louis James, but again the bonds of matrimony were severed by legal process.

Mrs. George J. Bucknall made Senator J. P. Jones the guest of honor at a dinner recently. Amongst the others present were Mrs. William S. Woods, Mayor and Mrs. Edward Robeson Taylor, Mr. Ventura and Dr. Bryant.

Mrs. Alexander McCrakin and Miss Isabel, the wife and daughter of Commander McCrackin of the West Virginia, have returned from an enjoyable visit to Yosemite Valley.

Mr. and Mrs. Stuart Baldwin, who have taken the home of Mrs. George Rowe at Ross Valley for the summer, were the hosts at a dinner last Thursday.

And apropos the stork, rumor hath it that the big bird is contemplating settling on the roof tree of the Russell Colts, who, most probably, would be more easily recognized as the Ethel Barrymores.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Eloeser of Mill Valley have taken the Elwood Brown home at Presidio and Pacific avenues for a year.

Dr. and Mrs. Bryant and Miss Marie Louise will spend the summer in Mill Valley.

Millen Griffiths, son of Mrs. Edwin Griffiths of Ross Valley, is home from the east to spend his college vacation with his mother.

The advent of twins in the home of the Albert Dibblees Jr. has created quite a flutter. Mrs. Dibblee was a Miss Rogers,

Mrs. Selby Hanna, who has been enjoying a trip to Mendocino County, will arrive in the city during the week, and next month she and Mr. Hanna will leave for New York. Mrs. Hanna has been writing a play which, so it is said, has real literary merit and has been already accepted. Mrs. Charles Huse, formerly Juanita Wells, a sister of Mrs. Hanna, is still in Mendocino, roughing it with a party of eastern tourists. They will remain in the wilds during the greater part of the summer.

Mr. James D. Phelan motored to Aetna Springs, entertaining Mr. Enrique Grau and Mr. F. E. Johnston of Napa.

Mr. and Mrs. W. T. Bishop and Mr. and Mrs. Bishop from Los Angeles arrived in their automobiles at Aetna Springs, where they intend to spend a few days.

Mr. and Mrs. S. W. Holliday and Mr. and Mrs. Burk Holliday and their children left for New York last week to spend the summer at the country home of the Huntingtons. Mrs. Burke Holliday is a daughter of the house of Huntington.

Mrs. Ryland B. Wallace and her son Bradley have arrived in Paris, where they will spend the summer.

Robert Knight of London, who recently arrived from Calcutta, India, has been making a number of short trips about the State. He is one of the most influential men in India, being editor of the Statesman of Calcutta. Mr. Knight is en route for London for a brief visit. With him at the Fairmont are his two brother, J. and H. Knight.

A lively young set is enjoying the summer in and around Mill Valley. They attend all the dances at Sausalito, San Rafael, Ross Valley and that vicinity, and are having the best kind of a time.

A dinner was given on Monday night by the members of the Governor's staff to the latest addition to their number, the Reverend Father Joseph P. McQuade, and was an occasion of good fellowship. Seated around the table spread in the red room of the Fairmont were all the members of the staff gathered to honor the "fighting father" who has seen service with the regulars in the Philippines. Those present were Governor Gillett, General J. B. Lauck, General George Stone, Colonel George Pippy, Colonel F. E. Beck, Father Joseph P. McQuaide, Colonel H. D. Loveland, Colonel Thomas Wilhelm, Colonel Thomas Weineke, Colonel John H. Hendy, Colonel Midsummer travel to San Francisco fully justifies the term applied to the city "the greatest summer resort on the coast." Not taking into account the special tourists attracted by the annual convention of Elks in Los Angeles the business up to date has been unusually heavy, and the reservations asked for at the larger hotels, such as the Fairmont, indicate that the heaviest part is yet to come.

Mr. and Mrs. W. H. La Boyteaux were entertained by Mr. and Mrs. Geo. M. Rolph at Aetna Springs.

Amongst the notable parties stopping at the Fairmont is that of Dr. C. A. Keen of Buenos Ayres, Argentina, South America. Dr. Keen, who is one of the most successful and prominent professional men of that city, is making an extended tour of this country after an absence of many years, and the exposition at Seattle is one of the points which he means to favor. Included in the Keen party are Dr. C. A. Keen, Justina de Keen, Dr. W. Escudero, Lucania de Escudero, Masters Hector and Rafael Keen, Misses Rebecca and Almira Keen, M. E. Keen and Z. Keen.

July sees the advance guard of the great army of tourists bound for Europe well on their way to the peaceful invasion of countries waiting to heartily welcome the invaders, while the still larger number of holiday-makers intending to visit home resorts gets busy with time-tables, guide books, etc. There will always be a certain number of people of defective mental make-up who affect to despise the vacation habit. All healthy-minded and intelligent men and women, however, recognize the advantage and true economy of health and energy of periodical rest and change. And the influence of the summer months stirs the wanderlust in the blood and sends the thoughts from desk and office and store to woods, fields, mountains and seashore. The extent of the custom of taking regular holidays everywhere marks the advance of civilization and is an indication of the phase of culture attained by a community.

Tours around the world are always "in season." Start when you like, if your route has been planned by one who knows how, you can follow the pleasant weather all around the globe, and see every country at its best. For the routes best adapted to the needs of pleasure travelers, however, the fall and early winter should be chosen for leaving America, in order to secure the best results. Thos. Cook & Son's escorted tours that have been making this wonderful journey since 1872 leave about that time. The series for 1909-1910 present a number of novel features in addition to the standard attractions of the usual 'Round-the-World Tour. Among these features are visits to Manchuria and Korea, Java, Siam, the Philippines, etc. All the other Eastern lands that have for centuries drawn travelers and adventurers across the seas are of course seen—Japan, China, the Straits Settlements, Ceylon, Burma, India. With their long experience of travel in these remote countries, the unique and complete system of Offices everywhere along the route, and other extensive and exclusive facilities, are secured which are opportunities not otherwise obtainable.

Stage

At the Van Ness

"The Merry Widow" will arrive at the Van Ness on Sunday evening, July 4, and on the following day will help to celebrate the National holiday by a special matinee which, it is expected, will prove a record breaking performance. Two years of anticipation has whetted the appetites of the votaries of musical comedy and the Viennese operetta has lost nothing of its attractions in the meantime. It seems incredible that "The Merry Widow" has never before toured either Europe or America, yet such is the fact. Wherever it has been produced it has remained. Vienna has heard it since New Year in 1906; London will keep it three years; this country already has a record of one year for New York, six months for Chicago and five months for Boston, and it may be years before it will be heard in all the cities of the United States, for Mr. Savage has only one company on tour, though it is conceded to be the best organization which has produced the attraction. Some of the artists to be heard here are Mabel Wilber, the soprano who has captivated the country in the title role; George Damerel who, as Prince Danilo, who has a beautiful tenor voice and a handsome stage presence and holds the record for the number of performances, having played in New York, Chicago, Boston and other cities, Thomas Leary, well known in this city, who played the part of "Wish" for two years, Oscar Figman who has created a sensation in the role of the Ambassador, and John O'Donnell. The "Madame Butterfly" orchestra and the Hungarian musicians are additional features with this famous organization. The company numbers about a hundred and the scenic investiture will be of unusual beauty. It will be the musical event of the year and already many theatre parties have sent in applications for locations.

"Three Weeks"

The thousands who have pleasant recollections of Elinor Glyn's "Three Weeks" will have an opportunity to see the dramatization of the novel, done by the author herself, at the American Theatre for one week beginning July 4. The event has a local interest since the character of the queen will be portrayed by Miss Beryl Hope, an actress of unquestioned charm and ability, who was the first to make "Sapho" known to our western world. The big, handsome Harry C. Browne will appear as Paul, and other members of the cast will be Miss Lilian Rhodes, Miss Caroline Lamar, Messrs. Frank J. Kirk, Sydney Price, William C. Chatterton, W. T. Hayes, W. J. McConnell, R. H. Thomas, Charles Moncrief, William Casey and Albert Duall. Special scenic effects will be introduced, notably the lawn of the hotel at Lucerne and the logia of the palace at Venice, where the feast of roses occurred. The play differs somewhat from the book, inasmuch as there is a prologue which shows the Queen of Sardalia at home and introduces her drunken and vicious husband, thereby furnishing a motive for her subsequent actions. Though the story itself did not give much promise of a play, it has been developed into a powerful love tragedy with high motive and principle. Early in the action we are introduced to Paul's parents and the honest, bluff Captain Grigsby. In fact, all the most interesting characters and situations in the book are brought into the play.

At the Alcazar

Belasco and Meyer have yielded to insistent public demand, and commencing with a matinee on Monday, July 5, the week's attraction at the Alcazar will be "Sapho," with Florence Roberts in the title role, a part in which she made one of her memorable hits at the old Alcazar, when the play ran for six consecutive weeks. The story of the drama is well known. It was written by Alphonse Daudet as an object lesson for his young son, to impress upon his immature mind the inevitable consequences of such an entanglement, and he painted in broad strokes with strong colors. Though the sorrow wrought by the infatuation of the raw and bashful country youth, Jean Gaussin, and the sophisticated Parisian, Fanny Legrande, as bent on holding him in her toils as he was to escape her wiles, created such a storm of disapproval when the piece was first produced, there have been a score of American plays since built up on the same lines. There is nothing in "Sapho" which need offend the most fastidious, for readers and audiences take away only what they bring with them. Thurlow Bergen will play Jean, and the rest of the caste is filled by the cream of the Alcazar company, helped out by extra silent auxiliaries. No expense has been spared in the staging. In the first act, the ball room scene with its scores of gaily garbed revelers crossing and recrossing, every moment of each individual is managed so as to throw the principals into prominence. If they had not a word to speak they would be recognized as those around whom the drama is woven. The last scene, where the infatuated Jean carries Fanny up a spiral stairway, was never rewarded with fewer than half a dozen curtain calls in the old Alcazar presentations.

Orpheum Vaudeville

The Orpheum program for next week promises entertainment of a delightful and novel character. The headline attraction is "Redpath's Napanees," in which George Hillman is featured with four clever girls and as many boys in the most charming school act of today. It depicts an old fashioned school house with a German teacher, Mr. Hillman, constantly plagued and tormented by mischievous pupils. The skit is full of fun and contains a number of catchy songs and dances. The Three Sisters Athletas, famous throughout Europe as acrobats, will make their first appearance here. They have been received with enthusiasm in this country wherever they have appeared. Harry Armstrong and Billy Clarke, two of America's best known song writers, will contribute a one-act divertisement called "Finding a Partner," which will introduce some of their latest song hits including "Baby Doll," "The Brave Fireman," and "Sweet Adaline." Herr Londe and Fraulein Tilly will produce one of the most unique novelties ever imported from Europe. Fraulein Tilly created an immense stir abroad, as the ladder manipulations in which she carries off the burden of the act were considered the most marvelous exhibition of their kind ever witnessed in the eastern hemisphere. Next week will be the last of the "Eight Madcaps," Max Witt's Singing Colleens, Ollie Young and Brothers, and Laddie Cliff, the famous English boy comedian and grotesque dancer who has made one of the greatest hits in the history of the Orpheum. The usual series of novel motion pictures will close the show.

"Heart of Maryland" at Ye Liberty

Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, has a most appropriate play to offer its patrons Fourth of July week in "The Heart of Maryland," David Belasco's celebrated Civil War drama in which it will be remembered Mrs. Leslie Carter gained her fame. Not since Mrs. Carter made her trip across the continent as the star in this drama has it been seen in Oakland, so it will be practically new to the playgoers of that city, and its patriotic sentiment and many striking scenes should make it an exceedingly popular attraction. Everyone knows the story of "The Heart of Maryland." It is about the only Civil War play ever written that leaves not a single sting for either side—North or South—and this, coupled with its many other attractive qualities, not the least of which is its delightful love interest, has made it a play loved the country over. In the role of Maryland Calvert, Miss Florence Oakley, the Liberty's new leading lady, will be given her first chance to display in Oakland her ability as an emotional actress. The part is a splendid one, and will enable her to sustain the exceedingly favorable impression she made by her initial appearance as "the girl" in "The Girl of the Golden West." Sydney Ayres will appear as her Southern lover who casts his lot with the North; Henry Shumer has the great heavy role of Thorpe. The cast throughout will be of equal strength. Scenically, the piece will be given the finest production it has ever received aroun dthe bay. It will be followed by Arnold Daly's recent New York success, "The Regeneration," a play entirely new to Oakland.

BERYL HOPE

Who is featured in Elinor Glyn's "Three Weeks" at the American Theatre.

International Grand Opera Company at Princess

The success of the International Grand Opera Company at the Princess Theatre has covered with confusion the wiseacres and quidnunes who declared most positively that a Grand Opera Season in mid-summer must result in absolute failure as far as patronage was concerned. For the past three weeks the attendance at the Princess Theatre have been very large at every performance and in several instances standing room was unobtainable. The organization is certainly a very complete one and in every way worthy of the immense success which has attended it. The repertoire for next week is very attractive and will doubtless result in the continuance of popularity. Monday evening "Traviata" will be repeated by popular request and on Tuesday evening Mascagni's "L'Amico Fritz" will be presented not only for the first time in this city but also for the first time in this country. Great preparations are being made for the event and it is safe to predict that musical San Francisco will assemble in full force. Wednesday matinee "Fedora" will be sung and on Wednesday evening "Faust" will be the program. Thursday evening will witness another important musical event, the production of Verdi's masterpiece, "Otello," with Louis Samoiloff in the title role. Although an American born Mr. Samoiloff has spent a considerable portion of his life abroad, especially in Italy where he has won great fame. In Milan, Rome and other leading Italian cities he has been received with enthusiasm, especially by the press, who consider him one of the greatest tenors of the present day. "Otello" will be repeated on Sunday evening and on Friday evening the always popular double bill, "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "I'Pagliacci" will be presented. At the Saturday matinee "The Barber of Seville" will be given for the first time in several years.

In the Limelight

Marie Doro in "The Morals of Marcus" will close her engagement at the Van Ness Theatre this Saturday night. The charming actress has completely captivated local theatregoers.

Frederic Thompson's spectacular comedy drama, "Polly of the Circus" will follow "The Merry Widow" at the Van Ness Theatre. It is recorded as one of the distinct hits of the past season in New York.

The first Merry Widow matinee will be given at the Van Ness Theatre on Monday. The regular Saturday matinees will be offered during the engagement.

Dustin Farnum is to bring his latest success, "Cameo Kirby," to the Van Ness Theatre in the near future.

WHAT WOMEN HAVE SAID ABOUT MEN

There is nothing in the whole range of life so dispiriting and so unnerving as a monotony of indifference. Active persecution and fierce chastisement are torture to the nerves, but the weary conviction that no one cares, that no one notices, that there is no humanity that knows and no duty that pities, is more destructive to all higher effort than any conflict with tyranny or barbarism.—Ouida.

When a man deliberately elects a great personal sacrifice, he does not concern himself with its details, as women are more likely to do.—Elizabeth Stuart Phelps.

A sceptic is a man who believes in neither doctors nor lawyers—as long as he is enjoying good health and his debts are few.—Nellie Cravey Gillmore.

A man with a weak brain and a strong will is merely an untractable brute; you can have no hold on him; you can never lead him right. A tyrant under any circumstances is a curse.—Charlotte Bronte.

It is so easy to be heroic when one is young! One does not realize how long life is going to last afterward, nor what weary work it is gathering up the fragments.—Edith Wharton.

HOTEL VENDOME SAN JOSE

¶ This famous hostelry of the Santa Clara Valley is unsurpassed in the West for beauty of environment and for those qualities which contribute to ease, comfort and contentment. The atmosphere of this hotel is ideal, redolent as it is of a hospitality that is peculiarly gratifying to wanderers from home. Everything about the hotel reflects the genial personality of the host, Mr. H. W. Lake, who is probably the most experienced hotel executive in the state. The situation of the Vendome is such that it is most inviting to motorists, which is evidenced by the fact that it is always the objective point of automobile parties from either side of the bay. At the Vendome they receive special attention and the accommodations for them are complete.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Cotton: When the trappings of the gaudy speculator are brushed aside and the insignificant daily stories that are put out to influence the market 10 or 12 points are thrown into the scrap heap where they belong, and a judicial balance of legitimate influences is taken, it is seen that price optimists in cotton have a credit on the right side of the account, which can probably be offset only by a perfect weather score during the remainder of the season—such weather as shall assure a production equal to the expanding needs of the world's textile mills and the world's peoples. In a general sense the years of 1907 and 1908 were a period of liquidation. Merchants discharged old obligations and made as few new ones as possible. They let stocks run low. Simultaneously consumers found it necessary to buy sparingly. They used old supplies as long as they would last and devoted themselves to the production of resources to tide over the crisis and to create new wealth for the coming business revival. This year has already given evidence, most notably in steel and iron, of expansion and a return to the normal process of stocking up. The business world has taken hope and is preparing to enter upon new enterprises with spirit and determination born of returning confidence. The cost of textile expansion and improvement in New England for 1909 is estimated in the best posted quarters at $60,000,000, probably the largest showing ever made for a single year. It is anticipated that the South will expend $25,000,000 for the same purpose. Abroad, particularly in Manchester, the number of spindles has been enormously increased during the past five years. The late depression checks the tendency, but new mills already in operation will consume thousands of bales of cotton never before wanted there. It is the crop of 1909, with the moderate surplus to be carried over from 1908, that must supply these expanding wants. That crop begins with a decrease acreage of 3 to 5 per cent in the south and no important increase in acreage in any portion of the globe. Simultaneously the crop in all other States except Texas is in a lower stage of development than at the same time last year, owing to excessive rain in May and June, which delayed cultivation, while in Texas, although the cotton is in excellent physical condition at the present time and quite thrifty, it is two to six weeks late as a result of the unprecedented drought extending from last September until late in May which prevented the crop from going into the ground at an average date. Since the boll weevil covered that State it has been history that large crops were early ones. Over practically the entire producing area of Southern and Central Texas, which makes about two-thirds of the State's crop, the boll weevil, when in the third and fourth generation, cuts off 75 to 90 per cent of the squares formed, only older and partially matured bolls being exempt from their depredations. The theorists, therefore, are supported by facts in their argument that the probabilities do not favor a large Texas yield proportioned to the acreage planted. Thus there has already been raised a presumptive question of the adequacy of the coming year's supply of raw cotton. The effect of gold supply, involving as it does the quantitative theory of money in relation to prices, is an academic question and need not be discussed here, but many of the leading economists are united in saying that the very large increase in the gold production of the past ten years and the consequent increase in the supply of money has been effective in advancing all commodity prices. But whatever the reason, the fact remains that prices according to Bradstreet's index in America and that of the Economist in London have recovered to the level of 1907 showing a world wide rally from the slump in values that followed the memorable September panic of that year. Foodstuffs of all kinds are high and other necessaries of life are advancing. From one viewpoint the high price of eatables is an argument against high prices for cotton and textiles because the consumer can economize on his shirts but hardly beyond a certain point in his meal barrel, but if the gold production has anything to do with the advance of wheat and steel and copper it should have the same effect on cotton. Raw cotton declined last autumn to 8½ cents, not so much because of panic or tight money or mills lack of prosperity as because it was marketed at an unprecedentedly rapid rate, the recurring supplies suggesting a crop in excess of all likely needs of the world in its then semi-depressed state. Something of the recovery then to 11½ cents may be attributed to let-up in the pressure of marketing and the disappearance of the threatened large surplus. And so much of the advance as has arisen from this source has only restored the normal price leaving other world-wide trade factors, influences of the new crop, and the prospective supply of another twelve-month to determine a further advance. These are facts of general application tending to show that present prices do not represent the full measure of enhancement in value that is likely in the event the supply of the coming crop is short of the world's full needs. In times past prices have sold much above eleven cents and remained there even with the level of other prices not so high as at present, when there was a bare supply of raw cotton. The visible supply of cotton is falling off at a more rapid rate than last year while the amount moving to market is decreasing faster which is cutting the supply likely to go over at the end of the season both by increased consumption and smaller marketing. The small marketing is undoubtedly the result of exhaustion of stocks on the farms, buyers who operate in the interior from Texas to North Carolina uniting in saying that it is impossible to buy any amount of cotton off the farm because there is none. Some idea of where the cotton is gone may be gained from this: Fall River Mills took to June 1st, for the preceding nine months of the cotton season, 397,903 bales of cotton as compared with 203,386 for the same period last year. The average cost of the cotton to these mills was probably in excess of ten cents the pound. There would appear no better evidence of the faith of the user of cotton in return of trade as well as in the stability of values than this stocking up. And to these figures there is to be added the buying of three months to complete the year. New Bedford, Lowell and other centers would no doubt make a similar showing where the figures available. If it does so decline because of favorable weather or otherwise, it is sure to be regarded as approaching the bargain point by a big waiting list of outside investors and speculators. Any material decline at the moment is therefore very unlikely and purchases made around the 11½ cents level should prove a safe investment and we believe will show handsome profits before supplies from the new crop are available. Should the crop prove to be as small as present conditions would seem to indicate 15 cents for cotton will look cheap when the world wakes up to the facts.

Stocks: There seems to be very little interest to say of the conditions at the week's close, operations being largely of the professional kind. Stocks receive good support on moderate declines. There is no reason to anticipate any material declines in the market and we expect none but it is doubtful if any extended speculation will prevail at the present period.

Wheat: There was excellent action in wheat for the entire week. There was a culmination of the bear market which was so pronounced last week when the selling was influenced by fine June scenery and anticipation of early harvests. Early this week there was some further selling of the same character because the first run of new wheat was promised at St. Louis and Kansas City. For each car of new wheat actually received at the Southwest markets the bears sold a million bushels short and this was the selling which got the trade in trouble later in the week. If wet harvest continues over the Southwest as indicated now and farmers prove independent about selling the new crop except at good stiff prices there is little question about a continuation of the bull although temporary reactions from this strong upturn of several cents may be in order. Everything points to a year of high prices for wheat. Europe needing more than usual from this side and the short winter wheat crop leaving us with less exportable surplus to meet the demand.

A DAINTY TOILET ARTICLE

Every lady who desires to keep up her attractive appearance, while at the theatre, attending receptions, when shopping, while travelling and on all occasions should carry in her purse a booklet of Gouraud's Oriental Beauty Leaves. This is a dainty little booklet of exquisitely perfumed powdered leaves which are easily removed and applied to the skin. It is invaluable when the face becomes moist and flushed and is far superior to a powder puff as it does not spill and soil the clothes. It removes dirt, soot and grease from the face, imparting a cool delicate bloom to the complexion. Sent anywhere on receipt of Five Cents in stamps or coin. F. T. What Men Have Said About Women

A cat has nine lives but a woman has nine cat's lives.—Thomas Fuller.

When Eve brought woe to all mankind,
Old Adam called her wo-man;
But when she wooed with love so kind,
He then pronounced her woo-man;
But now, with folly and with pride,
Their husband's pockets trimming,
The women are so full of whims,
That men pronounce them wimmen.

—Anon.

One of the best offices which women perform for men is that of tasting their books for them.—O. W. Holmes.

Ah, that is woman's way! She incites men to a difficulty, and then appears innocently on the battlefield with bandages for the belligerents. How many of the quarrels of this world she has caused, and how few ever witnessed!—James Lane Allen.

The woman who makes flannel shirts for the Hottentots is very likely to have a husband in her own home whose shirts need mending—J. G. Holland.

Was it not, for example, in the gray beginning of days, was it not woman whose mortal taste brought sin into the world and all our woe? Was not that Pandora a woman, who liberated from the box wherein they were confined the swarm of winged evils that still afflict us?—Henry Harland.

If the nose of Cleopatra had been shorter the whole face of the earth would have been different.—Blaise Pascal.

The girl whose face is her fortune soon finds that Father Time is a great spendthrift.—James Jay O'Connell.

Ten measures of garrulity, says the Talmud, were sent down upon earth, but the women took nine of them.

There was an old woman who lived in a shoe, and that accounts for the tongue in it.

A woman has this in common with the Deity—that her ways are past finding out.—Thomas Nelson Page.

A true lady—a genuine society queen—represents modesty, and sweetness, and self-control. She is evolved by gradual processes, from generation to generation—not ready made.—Robert Grant.

God made the woman and money the lady—Israel Zangwill.

I have met with women who, I really think, would like to be married to a poem and given away by a novel—John Keats.

There is probably no one in the civilized world more proud of the possession of a domestic servant than the American woman who has never had one, and no one more prompt to consign her to the obscurity of the kitchen after a feeble pretence of making her feel at home.—Robert Grant.

There was (not certaine when) a certaine preacher
That never learned, and yet became a teacher,
Who having read in Latine thus a text
Of "erat quidam homo" much perplext,
He seemed the same with studie great to scan,
In English thus, "There was a certaine man"
"But now" (quoth he) "good people, note you this,
He saith there was—he doth not say there is;
For in these daies of ours it is most plaine
Of promise, oath, word, deed, no man's certaine:
But by my text you see it comes to passe
That surely once a certaine man there was:
But yet I think in all your Bible no man
Can finde this text: 'There was a certaine woman.'"

MURINE EYE REMEDY CO., Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen:—We have a little fellow four months old who was troubled for three months after birth with sore eyes. A large amount of pus came from them, accompanied with severe inflammation. Our family Doctor, also an Eye Specialist, attended him without relief.

I saw your MURINE EYE REMEDY advertised in one of our Electric Cars, and utterly discouraged, I resolved to try it, and do you know, in three days' time all worry was over. In one week the Sore Eyes were a thing of the past.

This is an unasked for testimonial, but I know you will accept it as it is sent with much gratitude toward MURINE EYE REMEDY. Yours truly,

Arthur Snow.

Auto Notes

All the roads in the vicinity of Selma, California, have good hard foundation, but are not smooth, says G. S. Bloss, Jr., who has been circumnavigating the San Joaquin Valley with his Studebaker suburban for the past eight months. In an about Selma the roads are all passable but are rough and choppy in place. The main roads are good.

Dr. Daniel Crosby and family of Fruitvale have just returned from a trip to Del Monte. The Doctor reports the roads to be in fair condition, and his car—a Chalmers-Detroit "30" touring car—made the round trip with a perfect score.

The Diamond Rubber Company of Akron, Ohio, have just sent their Pacific Coast branch a detailed statement of the tire showing at 22 automobile shows held in the United States this year. It is interesting to note that there were 2739 sets of tires shown and 20 different makes represented. The average if all tires had equal representation would be 137. The Diamond Rubber Company however had a very big lead, there being 701¼ sets used in the various shows.

Roads leading out of Los Angeles in all directions, south as far as San Diego, east as far as Redlands, and north as far as San Luis Obispo are in excellent shape according to Harry A. Lord, the Studebaker agent of the southern part of the State and who has been doing considerable touring in Southern California ever since the pleasant weather began.

G. W. Haas and a party of friends have just returned to the city after a trip to the southern part of the State, where they spent about ten days touring in Mr. Haas' Chalmers-Detroit forty.

Excellent road conditions prevail from Woodland as far south as the Bluffs, says Geo. C. Comstock of Williams, Cal., who is doing considerable touring in that vicinity in his Studebaker. The road west of Williams to Bartletts, Allens, and Cook Springs is watered every day for a distance of fourteen miles, that is, as far as the mountains. This has rendered them in the finest shape possible for motorists.

With the levee five miles above Marysville repaired, the roads from Marysville are reported in excellent condition. The road between that town and Sacramento is again open and considerable traffic is now going on over this highway. The road from Marysville to Colusa, Williams and Willows, likewise to Bartlett Springs, Chico and Oroville and the northern districts is again open and J. R. Foster who uses several Studebakers in that vicinity is the authority for the statement that these roads are exceedingly inviting to autoists at this time.

Alexander Curlett took a party of friends up to Lake County last week and visited most of the watering places. The trip was made in their Thomas Flyer which carried eight people most of the way. Although it is becoming rather warm in this region, traveling is always comfortable with the top up, and the breeze which may be stirred up by a swift car.

Delightful touring is in store for motorists who journey from here to Gazelle, California, according to J. A. Denny of the latter town who has been using his Studebaker in that portion of the State continuously for many months. The roads from Dunsmuir on the south to Holt or Coles on the north are good. Particularly so are the roads from Edgewood to Ager, a distance of forty miles for automobiles.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 22931, Dept. No. 10.

CATHERINE FRANCIS BERTRAND, Plaintiff,
vs.
BENJAMIN A. BERTRAND, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City of and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to Benjamin A. Bertrand, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion of said plaintiff; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY ORDER OF SALE OF REAL AND PERSONAL ESTATE AT PRIVATE SALE SHOULD NOT BE GRANTED

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 6670, Dept. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of JOHN DEMARTINI, Deceased.

FLORA DEMARTINI, as Administratrix of the estate of John Demartini, deceased, having presented to this Court her verified petition for sale of all the real and personal property of which said decedent died seized and possessed, as far as known to your petitioner, which property is situated in the County of Tulare, State of California, and which is fully described in the petition of said administratrix, to which reference is made;

And it appearing therefrom that it is necessary to sell the whole thereof in order to pay the debts against the estate and costs of administration;

It is ordered that said petition be filed, and all persons interested in the estate of said John Demartini, deceased are directed to appear before the Court on the 20th day of July, 1909, at 10 o'clock a. m. of said last named date, at the courtroom of said Court, Grant Building, Southeast corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be granted to said administratrix to sell at private sale all of said real estate and the personal property belonging to the estate of said John Demartini, deceased, as prayed for in said petition; and it is further ordered that a copy of this order be published four (4) successive weeks in the "Town Talk," a newspaper printed and published in the said City and County of San Francisco.

Done in open Court this 10th day of June, 1909.

THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco State of California—No. 16627.

ROBERT HECTOR, Jr., Plaintiff,
vs.
All Persons Claiming Any Interest in or Lien Upon the Real Property Herein Described, or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California, to all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Robert Hector, Jr., plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest, or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly described as follows, to wit:

Lot number 210 as laid down, delineated and designated on a certain map on file in the office of the recorder of the said City and County of San Francisco, known as "Holiday Map A." Said map was filed in the office of the recorder of the City and County of San Francisco on the 1st day of May 1863.

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to wit, that it be adjudged that plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute, that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, or whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description, and that plaintiff recover costs herein, and have such other and further relief as may seem meet and proper in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 4th day of June, 1909.

"The Making of Bobby Burnit"

Bobby's father took almost the opposite course to that adopted by "Old Gorgon Graham." Burnit was a successful self-made merchant who had been too busy with his own affairs to give time to those of his only son, so Bobby grew up like most of the gilded youths of America with his business knowledge and experience confined to the signing of checks, the playing of sporting games in a sportsmanlike way and the filling of a desirable niche in the social world in an exemplary manner. When he came to make his will, old John Burnit was face to face with the plain fact that, as far as the serious responsibilities of life were concerned, Bobby was an utter fool of his father's making, so he set about correcting the evil he had done by making a will that nine out of ten heirs would have contested. One-half of his three million dollars he invested securely, so as to produce a certain income. The remainder, divided into quarter million lots, was at Bobby's disposal with which to buy experience, each installment due and payable as soon as its predecessor had vanished. Supplementary to the will were a series of letters left in the care of the old bookkeeper and the trustee, to be delivered to Bobby when the circumstances which they fitted arose, and the rapidity with which Bobby qualified himself for the advice thus put in cold storage for him was at first somewhat dizzying. The reader will sympathize with the victim in his view, that it was a pity the "governor" did not give it before instead of after, though it is a matter of practical experience that it is only after failure that the advice which would have forestalled it seems to be palatable. The process of making Bobby is akin to that of throwing a half-grown puppy overboard to see if he will swim. If the water is not too deep or too cold, and the endurance trial not too severe, and if, to begin with the little beast is of the proper breed, he will make land and be none the worse for his experience, but if any one of the conditions is too stringent, or if he happens to be of a species not calculated for swimming, then, what might have proved a valuable animal in a different environment or with a little help at the critical moment, is needlessly crippled or destroyed. Young Burnit happened to be of the right stuff. He had a genuine fondness for his father and respect for his memory. Being only one remove from soil, he still had grit enough to endure, though it is doubtful whether the son of inherited millions would have succeeded against the odds. Bobby Burnit was just a good thing at first, and he took hold of every plausible scheme presented to him by the schemers who had knocked their heads against the stone wall of his father's hard sense, and eventually he won out. Of the two courses however, that of Old Gorgon Graham, who took his young hopeful into the business, made him begin in the cellar, and gradually initiated him into all the mysteries of his calling, and that of John Burnit who shook the admonitory finger of a dead hand at Bobby and reminded him, "I knew you would," the Graham method is decidedly superior. It has a fairly good chance to win with nine boys out of ten, while the Burnit plan is guaranteed to fail in the same proportion. The various enterprises in which young Burnit interested himself, the identity of his trustee, and what happened when Bobby discovered that he had a temper and learned how to use it make the story which George Randolph Chester has told, and he has done it so well that his readers will give no thanks for hints in advance. Bobbs-Merrill are the publishers, James Montgomery Flagg and F. R. Gruger the illustrators, and the dedication is "To the handicapped sons of able fathers and the handicapped fathers of able sons, with sympathy for each and a smile for both."

THE "NOW FOLK" MOUNTAIN HOME

Among the virgin redwoods of the Santa Cruz mountains, a two hours ride from San Francisco by rail and a half hour's drive from the Glenwood station on the S. P. R. R. is situated the only NEW THOUGHT center and Summer Resort on the Pacific Coast. At an elevation between five and six hundred feet, this mountain tract (formerly the SUMMER HOME FARM) embraces one hundred and fifty acres of wild woodlands, groves of stately redwoods, pines and cedars—maples, laurels and alders, with grasses, ferns and wild-flowers on every hand. It also contains an equal acreage in orchards, vineyards, hay lands and pastures. Deep canyons, a cool, rushing trout stream, sunny slopes and shady woodland idealizes the Home as a place for mental and nervous conditions. Outdoor games, a dancing pavilion, piano and other music offers pleasure and recreation to all. In the Emerson Grove, summer classes in NEW THOUHT and EMERSON LECTURES are conducted by Henry Harrison Brown, who is both the owner and Director of the Home. Conveyances meet trains on request, and conduct driving parties to the Santa Cruz sea beach, the Big Trees, the Fish Hatchery at Brookdale and other nearby places of interest. All farm and dairy products—and fruits in season. Visitors will find all the comforts and atmosphere of home, where one may "loaf and invite the Soul."

Severe Tests Prove Its Superiority

Although a comparatively new product, Zerolene has been more severely tested under all conditions than many other lubricants, and, distinctly better than any of these, has triumphed in every test.

ZEROLENE

Auto Lubricating Oil

lubricated the winning Thomas car in the famous New York to Paris race, also the Protos and Zust cars which ran second and third. Zerolene proved its perfect lubricating and non-carbonizing qualities, and its zero-working ability in the most severe tests to which a lubricating oil has ever been put.

Zerolene is the only "all round" oil that serves all types of cylinders and bearings. There is only one kind of Zerolene, produced in only one place in the world. Put up in sealed cans with patent spout that cannot be refilled. Also in barrels for garage trade.

John Bright never was in any school a day after he was 15.

Gladstone was in Parliament at 22; Lord of the Treasury at 24.

Francis Bacon, Earl of Verulam, graduated at Cambridge when he was 16; was called to the bar at 21.

Robert Peel was in Parliament at 21.

Palmerston was Lord of the Admiralty at 23.

Henry Clay was in the Senate of the United States at 29, contrary to the constitutional provision which makes 30 the minimum age limit.

Judge Hampton was a student at law in the Inner Temple at 19, having already graduated at Oxford.

Gustavus Adolphus ascended the throne at 16. Before he was 34 he was one of the greatest monarchs of Europe.

Judge Story was in Harvard at 15, in Congress at 29, and Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States at 32.

Conde conducted a memorable campaign at 17. At 22 both he and Turenne were of the most illustrious men of their time.

Daniel Webster was in college at 15, gave earnest of his quality before 25 and at 30 was the peer of the ablest men in Congress.

William H. Seward began the practice of law at 21; at 31 he was president of a state convention; at 37 governor of New York.

Washington was a distinguished colonel in the army at 22 and commander in chief at 43.

Maurice of Saxony, who died at 32, is conceded to have been one of the profoundest statesmen and ablest generals christendom has ever known.

Napoleon commanded the army of Italy at 25. At 30 he was not only one of the ablest generals but one of the greatest lawgivers of the world. At 46 he saw Waterloo.

Leo X was Pope at 38. He had finished his academic training and taken the office of Cardinal at 18.

William Pitt entered the University at 14; was Chancellor of the Exchequer at 22; Prime Minister at 24, and held the office for twenty years; at 35 was the most powerful uncrowned head in all Europe.

From the earliest years of Queen Elizabeth to the present time, England has had scarcely an able statesman who did not leave the university by the time he was 20, and many left at an earlier age.

Lord Beaconsfield, who entered the active world early, began his political career by writing a book at 17 in which he predicted that he would become Prime Minister.

THE AGE OF LOVE

"With your permission, Matilde, I shall speak to your mother on the subject."

"I have grave doubts, sir, as to whether mother would care to marry again!"

WORSHIP

When thou, by unrelenting grief pursued,
Enterest the temple, and in silent dole
Standest there, lost in that vast multitude,
Like to a part of one great suffering soul,
Thy pain has sunk therein, unknown to thee;
And thou perceivest now thy spirit driven,
Mysteriously, forth to its kindred sea,
And mingled with it, surging up to heaven.

When the Police Are Convinced

Since the killing of Caroline Brasch there has been much mouth-filling denunciation of the business methods of the Gray brothers. These methods pregnant as they are with injustice excite our indignation. It is proper that we should reprobate them and urge that law be enacted to protect unskilled labor against the greed of employers, but let us not lose sight of the methods of the authorities by which crime is fastened on accused persons. Of these methods the public is not entirely unfamiliar; but they are tolerated without question or criticism, though the most transcendent issues of life and liberty depend on the accuracy, precision and honesty employed in the treatment of evidence in criminal cases. Striking exemplification of the perniciousness of our police methods is to be found in the conduct and attitude of the detectives toward the man who was first arrested for the murder of Caroline Brasch. Convinced that he was the murderer, the detectives proceeded with the work of filling in the unapparent details to harmonize with provisional hypotheses, and the probability is that if James Cunningham had not surrendered himself and confessed that he was the murderer, by this time Joseph Novak would be so overwhelmed with amazement at the multitude of proofs of his guilt that he himself would be on the verge of doubting his innocence and yielding to the persuasions of the irresistible "third degree." It must be remembered that the police had only just begun to fasten the crime on Novak when Cunningham surrendered himself. The police caught Novak in the very act of trying to make his escape from town; that is, he was seeking work in the country, through an employment agency. A circumstance this conceived in police circles to be irrefragable proof of guilt. In Novak's case the usual method of identification was employed. As to matters of identity proofs might be multiplied to any extent of the boundless region of error shown by experience to be open on every side for the distraction and confusion of witnesses to the identity of persons, but the police never conceive it to be their duty to safeguard the suspected person against error. Instead of requiring that the suspected person be picked out of a group they indicate the person whose identity is to be fixed and suggestionize the witnesses. This is what was attempted with reference to Novak, but the witness proved to be a man of powerful scruples, of even singular stubbornness; for experience teaches that it is one of the weaknesses of human nature to be eager to supply important links in chains of evidence in sensational criminal cases. Though Novak was not identified the convictions of the police were not shaken. As he had changed his hat and his coat they concluded that his appearance had been sufficiently altered to confuse the witness, and the alteration was recorded as additional proof of guilt. We can only conjecture what the result might have been had Cunningham not surrendered himself. In the light of recent experience we could not be justly accused of fantastical speculation were we to theorize on the improbabilities of an acquittal in Judge Lawlor's court, where proofs of the consciousness of guilt are permitted beyond the third degree of hearsay evidence.

A Real "Yellow Peril"

Apprehension is expressed by skilled mechanics in this city that they may be compelled shortly to meet the competition of similar labor of Japan working under a wage scale more than fifty per cent less than that paid to the American workman. It is given as a specific instance of this competition that the Japanese are already manufacturing electrical supplies and shipping them to this country, not only underselling the local manufacturers but cutting into the labor market to curtail the earnings of the workingman. The statement is also made that the Bell telephone company has taken preliminary steps to establish a manufacturing plant in Japan with the ultimate intention of taking advantage of the cheap labor of that country to manufacture electrical supplies for sale in the United States. This is apparently regarded by the workingmen of California as a new "peril" out of Asia; but the fact of the matter is it has always existed and the wonder of it is that it has not sooner manifested itself. Heretofore obstructions to Oriental competition with Western manufactures have been practically insurmountable; high tariffs, excessive freight charges, lack of proper raw material and the scarcity of trained labor have all operated to discourage the establishment of competing factories in the Far East operating with coolie labor cheaper than slave labor because the employer is at no expense for the maintenance of the slave. Wise men, however, have predicted that the day is close at hand when the countless hordes of Asia would be brought into direct and fatal competition with the white laborer of America. It has been frequently prophesied that some day the conditions would be favorable for the investment of vast capital of Western financiers in the cheap labor of China, and that when the time came for profitable exploitation of this labor the markets of the world would be glutted with the product of Chinese factories capitalized by American and European money. This is the "yellow peril" which wise statesmen and far-sighted political economists have long feared; and it seems now that the "peril" is taking definite shape. Everybody is familiar with the fabric commonly called "nankeen." Few persons know that the name of the cloth is derived from the name of the capital of a Chinese province and that the goods are re-imported American cottons colored by a peculiar Chinese process. For many years the dye works of Nankin and other Chinese industrial centers have imported raw cotton from America for the manufacture of "nankeens" which they exported to the market from which they had imported the raw cotton. In due course of time it will be no longer necessary to import American cotton raw or manufactured into China. The cotton fields of Southern China, Tonquin, Honan and Cochin-China are rapidly becoming amply sufficient to supply the needs of domestic manufacture. There are iron mines in Western China now developing, and coal mines abound in all the Central, Northern and Western provinces. The superstition of the Feng-shui or earth demon is no longer an obstacle to the development of the resources of China, and mining operations are increasing yearly not only on the foreign concessions but under impetus of Chinese capital. All the rails of the railroad between Hankow and Pekin and Hankow and Fatshan, near Canton, were manufactured in the rolling mills of Hankow from steel out of the iron mines of Honan. The cotton mills of Shanghai are manufacturing fabrics of this material on looms made in America and all sorts of the lighter grades of machinery are produced in Chinese factories, most of which at present are operated with foreign capital. But it will not be long before the Chinese will themselves begin to reap the profit which is inevitable from these enterprises.

Industrial Development in Japan

Japan is the country out of which this "yellow peril" will loom most portentously in the immediate future. The Japanese are not an inventive race; they have never originated anything; but they are adepts in imitative production; they are unsurpassed in the ability to combine the best features of foreign invention to produce an article superior to the original; and they are unscrupulous in the use of this faculty. The Japanese have during the past few years imported vast quantities of American machinery and they have remodeled and readjusted this machinery until it is now better adapted for the work than it was when it came from the American factory. The city of Osaka in Southern Japan is called "the Chicago of Japan" and "the Manchester of the Far East," because it is a city of factory chimneys and looms and foundries and all the industries. It is from Japan, therefore, that the "yellow peril" will come in this special guise of competition with Western industrial conditions. Japanese capital is being invested in these enterprises and Japanese exporters will do the rest. The Japanese will not be slow to exploit the millions of the cheap labor of China in the same manner. They are now manufacturing electrical supplies; some day they will sell shoes and combined harvesters and sewing machines and automobiles in San Francisco and Chicago and New York and all the cities of Europe. This "yellow peril" is very real and very near.

The Eliot Library

It is no more than was to have been expected that President Eliot's selection of "five feet of books" has caused a mighty discussion, for selecting books for others to read is as ticklish a problem as choosing a man's ties or a woman's hats, sight unseen. The list of books that any individual cares to own is dependent on other conditions besides their accepted value. People who have access to the stores of others, public or private, will most wisely select for ownership what they cannot otherwise obtain the use of, and they that have marked inclinations or are interested in science, history or mechanics will follow Emerson's advice, whether consciously or not, and buy books in the line of their genius. The highbrows have a tendency to ridicule those who read only interesting books, but they fail to grasp the idea that the books they recommend so highly are just as interesting to them as the novel of the gum-chewing type is to those that prefer it. While there is a limited class bent on the task of self-improvement, and willing to read anything recommended to them as guaranteed to produce results on the same principle that seekers after physical perfection will undergo tortures for the sake of a perfect complexion, the vast majority are preoccupied with business affairs, and have no time to devote to polishing the intangible. They read light literature for the same reason that they attend minstrel shows and vaudeville performances—to get as far away as possible from the problems that perplex their working hours. College professors are prone to forget that all knowledge is not confined to the printed page and that long before ideas are converted into alphabetic symbols they are discovered, discussed and passed from mind to mind through speech. The man in the street may never have heard of Marcus Aurelius or Epictetus, but he is, nevertheless, familiar with their "golden sayings," because the thoughts which they have uttered have passed through his own mind. The shrewd philosophy which the searcher after "local atmosphere" gathers from the tongue of the village worthy is in effect nothing more than the wisdom of the ages expressed in the current vernacular. Professor Eliot evidently assumes that the owner of the five-foot library has already perused the bulk of the world's literature and desires to sift the one grain of wheat from the bushel of chaff. He does not admit that there may be barley, oats, rice, corn, millet and other grains equally palatable, or that what agrees admirably with one digestion may be destructive to another. The echoes of the "Hundred best" discussion had scarcely expired in our ears when this new agitation compelled our attention. Before that it was "The books that helped me," which Agnes Repplier met with a counterblast "The books that have hindered me." We ought now to have a list of the hundred worst and those which we should not admit to our shelves on any terms had we unlimited time, space and money at our disposal.

Our Decadent Universities

The lamentation of some of the eastern college presidents that there is a disdain of intellectual life in the colleges and universities, seems like an echo of the wail of the clergy that religion is dying. Who is to blame? The colleges have been liberally supported for the one purpose of fostering the intellectual life and if they have preferred to lower their standards until, as President Wilson of St. Paul's school says, "The side shows have swallowed the circus," they have only themselves to blame. For lo, these many years, success has been measured by bulk. The larger the number of students enrolled, the higher the institution has rated itself, and in order to attract numbers every inducement for a good time has been held out. There is not one college in America which would think for a moment of taking the same pains to attract scholars that it does to lure athletes. Competition for twirlers and half backs is sharp. The faculty as well as the students themselves have a keen appreciation of "material" and though matches of brain have fallen out of the calculation altogether, matches of brawn grow in both frequency and popularity. it is conducted today is filled with a roistering pack that, for the most part, should be filling apprenticeships in shops and mastering mechanical trades. Love of the intellectual life is largely a matter of temperament. Neither wealth nor leisure nor parental ambition can supply what nature omitted, and the herding of congenital incompetents into secondary schools and colleges can have but one result—the debasing of standards and the exaltation of the one sort of enjoyment which the majority can comprehend. There is probably not a smaller proportion of the population interested in study in this twentieth century than there has been since the first establishment of places of learning, but colleges have increased and multiplied out of all proportion to their necessity, and they have been filled up in defiance of the principle of the utter absurdity of throwing pearls to swine.

More Religious Controversy

The United Presbyterian and the Jewish Criterion, both of Pittsburg, are engaged in a spirited controversy. The question at issue is Sunday observance. The Presbyterian affects to have discovered the "dechristianizing efforts of the Jews" in the twenty-five bills introduced in the Pennsylvania legislature "antagonizing the quiet and rest of the holy day." It warns the Jews that it is entirely owing to the magnanimity of the Christians that they have enjoyed so much liberty in America, and hints that unless they cease their objections to the observation of Christian holidays and other mild sectarian manifestations in the schools dire things may happen. The editor of the Criterion comes back in right good style, and having the advantage of a calmer and more judicial mind he makes his hits tell instead of firing broadcast and scattering shots. He asks by what authority the Presbyterian lays claim to the country, and reminds its editor that if Jews enjoy greater privileges in America than they do elsewhere the same is equally true of all Americans, and since the Constitution guarantees to every man the right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, the Jew has equal privileges with the Presbyterian and the right to protest against sectarian and denominational domination of the schools. Considering that William Penn founded his colony on the principle of freedom of conscience the controversy has not even the merits of the dictation which usually emanates from New England, but no doubt it would mightily surprise the godly editor of the Presbyterian and all his clerical brethren who assert that the United States is "a Christian land, although not yet wholly sanctified in the lives of its citizens," to learn that the treaty which was entered into with Turkey in the early years of the republic, when George Washington was its President, expressly states that this is not a Christian government and for that reason would never enter upon a war on religious grounds.

The balloon that was to be the chief feature of the celebration at Oroville on Monday broke away from its moorings just as it had been fully inflated and sailed straight up and out of sight. Who for Festival King?

Queen-Elect of the October Carnival Discusses Names of Those Who Might Share the Throne With Her, and Writes in Support of the Merriment That is to Prevail on Our Holiday.

By Miss Vergilia Bogue

I like the word, pageant, with its flavor of medievalism and stately, old-time diversion! Carnival carries with it the impression of any special period of mad joy, while festival is a term comprehensive of the whole succession of holiday demonstrations.

But, whether we say of those days of October that have been set apart to mark the hope and renewed courage of a community come triumphantly through disaster, and to celebrate the discovery of one of the great harbors of the world—the entry to a land more full of golden promise and fulfillment than any other in the world—whether we call them the festival or the carnival, or the pageant, we can all be sure that they are PORTOLA DAYS; and that means—all!

And now the question remains, Who shall be the proud Californian to wear the picturesque dress of the old Spanish navigator as he lives again, not only in our hearts, but the moving spirit of the gathering merrymakers?

Let us consider:

Verily we are confronted by an "embarrassment of riches," as the names of men fitted by nature, grace and merit for the honor rush into our minds.

The first suggested to everyone was, naturally, the genial, jolly leader of the Kermess; he who has stood, for years, as the representative of the best in social effort, in a city where the people are gathered from every quarter of the civilized world and conditions render selection and observance in such matters no mere sinecure. It has been hinted that this arbiter of society was not of proportions to lend verisimilitude to the dramatic effort proposed; but, are there not precedents in plenty, to justify an indifference to the consideration that the old Spaniard was "lean to a degree?" How many actors have impersonated men who were physically the very antithesis of themselves? For instance, how many a thin man has done Hamlet (who says of himself: "Oh! that this too, too solid flesh would melt!" and of whom it is said that he was "fat"), and has done it more than acceptably? Kemble, I believe, was not a weighty man, neither was John Hare, nor our own incomparable Edwin Booth, all of whom were of a day that may be supposed to prevent me forming my own personal judgment. And Irving, I know, was not to any noticeable extent hampered by the "too, too solid flesh,"—nor is that delicate impersonator of the melancholy Dane, E. H. Sothern, of unusual circumference, nor indeed, Forbes Robertson. But, however, I do not mean to imply that Ned Greenway is an actor.

Then there is Mr. Edward Hamilton, whom the newspapers find to possess all the physical graces that would doubtless idealize the old sailor to a point beyond recognition. He certainly seems calculated to lend dignity and beauty of person to the demonstration.

Mr. George Newhall would represent social conditions worthy of consideration—and these conditions are to be met at such a time as well as purely personal ones. Either Mathieu or Thornwall Mullally should look the part, and probably dignify it otherwise; as, also Mr. Gayle Anderton, who, however, is not of well enough established residence in the State to appear to be really representative of its epoch and people. Mr. Joseph Redding, the patron of learning, has been mentioned in the same connection—an honorable suggestion, and worth weighing.

The name of our world-famed poet, Joaquin Miller, has been brought up for discussion; and, at the suggestion, we may all bare the head in respectful recognition. Dignity and knightly qualities would meet in such a personality, while the poetic spirit would hover over the joyful scene, uniting the practical present, as in no other way it could be joined, to the shadowy, picturesque past.

Now, from another part of the State comes a suggestion as new as interesting. It is of a name distinguished in the annals of old California—one that brings up a vision of old Toledo; a loiterer in the Zocadover; or, a cloaked figure in a gloomy street of Cordova or Granada. He is, indeed, of the blood of the kindgom which once ruled the world. His face and figure show it, as well as his sonorous name and the heritage of acres come down to him from a time when his people received from the crown a dower to make them princes. It is said of him: "He is the very type of cavallero we imagine to have been the discoverer of San Francisco Bay. Don Nicolas Covarrubias of Santa Barbara and Santa Maria, is of commanding presence. One of the handsomest men in the State, he exhales a geniality that charms all who come within the radius of his great personal influence. On horseback he is a picture of manly grace, the epitome of the pride, the dignity and romance of a romantic race."

Added to all these qualifications there is something else that makes the name of the Don, (of undoubted Castilian blood), something to be reckoned with. His selection would give the fair South graceful recognition.

But whoever may be the final choice of those to whom has been given the delicate and difficult task of arranging the dramatis personae of the pageant, all who are interested in California and her future may be assured that the wisest and latest conclusions will be reached, all things considered.

Of the man's name now on every lip, there has much been said, as to its origin and pronunciation. I could not, for some time, comprehend the firm stand taken by the mayor with regard to the accented, final vowel. While, of course, it is conceded that in proper names the best custom decides accent and division of syllables—rather than the etymological rules that govern other

Dailies May Discard Pictures

Possibility That the Photo-Engravers' Strike, Which Comes From a Trivial Cause, May Bring a Blessing in the Shape of Newspapers Without Illustrations.

The trouble between the photo-engravers and the stereotypers, which resulted last week in the former walking out all over town, promises to be long drawn out, both sides expressing a determination to fight to the last ditch. The quarrel has tied up all work on the daily newspapers so far as new illustrations are concerned, it being impossible for the dailies to get a cut made in San Francisco. With the exception of one paper, none of them are allowed, according to an agreement with the photo-engravers, to have work done out of town. The consequence is that big news items of current events go unillustrated, except with old stock cuts. Cunningham, the murderer of Caroline Brasch, has not been pictured in the dailies, greatly to the disgust of news editors who are fond of "layouts" showing all the parties to a tragedy with a cross to mark the spot where the bullet struck or the victim fell. We are left to imagine what course Cunningham took when he left the scene of his crime. Without the photo-engravers' strike we should have had a complete diagram showing the victim, the office, the desks, the elevator shaft, the streets the murderer traversed after the killing.

To some, the lack of this was an irreparable loss. The extent of the deprivation among the classes who like their murders illustrated may be made understandable through a faithful report of a conversation carried on between two women across a narrow street of San Francisco on the occasion of a notable murder several years ago.

"Did yez read about the murder?" queried the first speaker.

"Yes," was the reply. "I saw it in the Call."

"Pooh! the Call! The Examiner had twice the pictures!"

And so they judged the story—not by the manner of its telling, but from the number of pictures that accompanied it. Whether or not the papers really gain through these pictures will be demonstrated if the present strike goes to the length predicted. Eastern papers are discarding illustrations of daily events. The Sun does not run them; neither does the Herald. The more conservative papers all over the country are dropping them—and they seem to thrive on the change.

At any rate, they are saving greatly in the matter of expense. Its costs The San Francisco Chronicle, for instance, $30,000 a year for its illustrations—these figures including what is paid not only to photo-engravers, but to artists and photographers. It is hardly to be believed that the Chronicle gains this amount in circulation or advertising because of its illustrations. To be sure, it could not afford to drop them unless its rivals did. But it is safe to say that if all the San Francisco dailies gave up their pictures and filled the place they occupy with news, they would gain in the end.

Illustrations were novelties once. It was wonderful to see last night's events depicted in this morning's paper. And the pictures were for a while looked upon as marvels of art. But the public is now beginning to place upon them their true valuation. They read their weekly paper, or their monthly magazine, and in them they see clear-cut finely printed portraits, or pictures of notable events—veritable works of art, some of them. Then picking up their daily paper they find coarse, black, smudged, indistinct pictures, seldom giving more than a hazy idea of the matter that is illustrated.

That the daily papers' pictures should be such, is inevitable. At all stages of reproduction, from the time the photograph is taken until the cut is fastened to the stereotyper's block, everything is done with a rush that precludes careful work. Then comes the printing at a great speed on cheap paper. Considering all things, it is rather remarkable that the result is not even worse.

Bad as the black and white work on the daily paper is, the colored work is more atrocious. Muddy reds, dingy blues, jaundiced yellows, with the reading matter showing through from the other side, are far from being works of art. And the so-called funny pictures—they are unspeakable from all standpoints—drawing, coloring and printing. It is gratifying to note that educators and ministers are protesting against them as immoral agents in the home, and that some of the best papers are discarding them. This course is not taken, however, for any other reason than that of utility. Parents are beginning to see that these pictures are bad for the children. They find that Johnny is disposed to be more mischievous through seeing mischief-makers glorified; that Tommy is less obedient through seeing the disobedience of some other youngster made the subject of jest. Parents find themselves regarded with less respect because in the comic supplement parents are made ridiculous. They are observing the development in their offspring of a strain of cruelty because of the cruelty taught by the funny paper. And because of these things, they are barring the Sunday supplements from their homes. The publishers are beginning to see this trend, and are acting accordingly.

To return to the source of the trouble between the engravers and the stereotypers—it is as trivial as are so many labor disputes. In preparing cuts for the press the stereotypers make the metal base to which the engraving, a thin sheet of metal, is to be nailed. The custom has been to send this metal base to the engravers, who would fasten the engraving to it. Now the engravers insist that they should send the plate to the stereotypers, whose duty, they maintain, it is to fasten it to the metal base. Out of this, the least important of all the work connected with newspaper illustration, has grown a strike which bids fair to be a long and bitter one; and which may rid us of the illustrated newspaper.

A Righteous Man

By Clara Viebig (From the German)

The wind swept the snow-covered ground. Slowly, one after another the lights went out in the village. One light alone remained, up there in the rectory by the lake. A thin ray from the study-window joined the moonbeams on the frozen road.

The pastor sat alone over his Bible; he was reading, his dark head resting on his hand, his haggard face bent low. His nose was strongly built, the corners of his mouth firmly set. But they were now drawn down in a line of deep fatigue. Diocesan visits, school examinations today, and yesterday—not until after dinner today had the representatives of churchly authority left him, jolting off to the station in the rickety rectory carriage. The days had been very fatiguing, although old Madame Printz had cooked her best and he himself had received many an encouraging word of praise.

"You are the sort of man the church is in need of," the well-meaning superintendent had said. "We have few like you, I'm sorry to say, few with such real, positive Christianity." Then, in another tone: "Say, my dear brother in the Church, why don't you marry? You must be very lonely here."

"I have reason to believe that I am not in good health, sir. My parents and several brothers and sisters have died of consumption. I should consider it a sin for me to marry and carry the seeds of disease further."

"Then you intend not to marry at all?"

"Yes. I dare not marry. God has forbidden me to do so." Martin Eisner coughed and set his lips firmly.

"Then you renounce the flesh, dear brother, for the honor of God!" The superintendent spoke in tones of admiration, glancing down at his own stately proportions. God has not demanded such renunciation of him; he thought of his rosy, buxom wife and his rosy, hearty children. They were well and strong and had no fear of the seeds of disease. And he said to the representative of the school board, as they jolted along in the rickety carriage: "Admirable young man that, a man who understands duty and belief. He will make his way in the Church, don't you think so?"

The representative of the school board answered with an inarticulate grunt. He was busy digesting his dinner.

The young pastor was thinking of this praise from his superior as he read the Revelation of St. John.

He that is righteous, let him be righteous still: and he that is holy, let him be holy still. And, behold, I come quickly, and My reward is with Me.

He read no further. In spite of his fatigue, pride and joy swelled his breast. Yes, he had been strong, he had been righteous and holy!

He sprang up, he could no longer sit quietly in his chair. With hands tightly clasped he strode to the window. Outside all the world was one glorious gleam. His deep-set, gloomy eyes opened more widely than usual; he stared out into the brightness, stared and stared.

The other side of the wall, in her narrow chamber, old Madame Printz tossed and sighed heavily. He did not heed it.

Righteous—holy—righteous! Holy!

His eyes followed the path of the moonbeams over the deep-worn ruts of the road until they touched the walls of Barthel Barnewitz's farm. It was just three years ago that he had confirmed Barthel's step-sister. She was twenty years younger than the peasant, and as sweet and fair as her brother was gnarled and rugged. Barthel's Naemi had soft, blond hair and great astonished blue eyes. She sat with the other village girls during the confirmation lessons. The others all had tanned flat faces, one like the other, with meaningless noses. Her face shone out among them like a rosy floweret. She sat there, trim and dainty, on the last bench with the oldest girls; her great, astonished eyes gazed steadily up at her priestly teacher, her shining hair stood out in relief from the whitewashed wall. The others called her haughty and teased her because she was so careful about herself.

The young pastor's hands held hers longer and longer each day in greeting and farewell. His fingers trembled when he touched the girl's pure brow at the ceremony of confirmation. It was her voice he heard above the others every Sunday. In sleepless nights he would lie thinking of how he would take her to be his cook when she was a little older. His old housekeeper groaned and coughed so at night. It disturbed his rest. It would be a very different thing to have the fresh young limbs of Barthel's Naemi lying there in the next room in the creaking bedstead. The room reeled, he grew dizzy, his eyes closed. He saw Naemi's blond braids, her sweet fresh face before him—she would be a pretty young cook for the rectory! He would not be quite himself again until he had arranged it.

A few days later he went over to Barthel Barnewitz's house and found Naemi just about to leave. She had had a disagreement with her brother and his wife, and was going into service in the city. She smiled and courtesied to the pastor; she knew she was a favorite with him and could take liberties. He smiled back at her. She whispered a shy farewell; he answered with a hasty pious word. She smiled again and kissed his hand gratefully. He turned and went away hastily, his lips even more firmly set than usual. He could have wept in his feeling of endless disappointment, in his secret anger. The rectory seemed more solitary than before, Madame Printz's cough more disagreeable. It would have cost him but a word, a single word. But he had not spoken that word, he had let her go away—

How gloriously he had resisted the temptation! He was righteous and holy—righteous and holy!

Not a step could be heard on the quiet, moonlit street, not a soul was in sight. What made the solitary man at the window start? Had he spoken aloud? "Righteous—holy." It was like an echo. He had looked around the room fearsomely. The green-shaded lamp did not light up the corners; it was dark here in contrast with the brightness outside.

The head of the Sorrowing Christ over the desk gleamed like a dark spot on a white surface. The framer had left a wide, white margin between picture and frame. Eisner looked up at it. He could not clearly distinguish the Crown of Thorns, nor the mouth drawn in pain, but it seemed to him that the drooping eyelids opened slowly. From the wall the Savior's eyes greeted him with the greeting of Brotherhood.

And he returned the greeting. "I suffer as Thou hast suffered. I renounce as Thou has renounced. Righteous—and holy—holy—holy—"

He returned to the window and pressed his forehead to the panes. The silence of Death reigned without and within.

Suddenly the old clock on the wall began to strike with a terrifying noise; ten heavy strokes and a dull rumbling afterwards. The sound echoed through the room. Brrrr—Surrrr rectory cook! that pretty young thing!—rrrrr—

A Great Scoop

The Call's "scoop," James Cunningham's confession that he was the murderer of Caroline Brasch, is regarded as one of the greatest pieces of luck that ever befell a newspaper; for it was by the merest chance that Cunningham went into the Call office. There, after giving a reporter his gun, he announced that he was the murderer. The rest was easy. Cunningham was taken to a private room, his full confession was extracted, and he was kept there until 4:30 the next morning, when he was turned over to the police. The Call came out with the complete story, while its contemporaries were still speculating as to whether Novak was the murderer. It was a great scoop, no doubt—yet not a scoop in the accepted sense of the word. No effort was made, no enterprise shown, as when Petie Bigelow interviewed Sontag and Evans for the Examiner; and no cunning was employed, as when that paper unearthed the fact that Lady Hope (May Yohe) was at the Palace Hotel with Captain Putnam Bradlee Strong. In short, nothing but luck enabled the Call to scoop its contemporaries and Cunningham himself says that if the Examiner had been in its old location at Third and Market he would never have gone to the Call office. "The Examiner office was too far away," he said at the city prison when asked as to why he had not gone there. "I knew there was some kind of a paper published in the Spreckels building. I didn't know its name, but I thought it would be a good place to give myself up." Thus the Examiner lost one of the greatest stories in twenty years because Willie Hearst hasn't yet been enterprising enough to put up a building on newspaper corner; and the Call got the scoop merely because it happened to be in a convenient location, and was known as "some kind of a newspaper."

The Spirit of the Times

Six citizens representative of the commercial industrial and financial interests of this city issued a call the other day for a mass-meeting for the purpose of examining the qualifications of candidates for office and recommending those that may be deemed most competent to serve the city and the taxpayers. Hardly had the call reached the citizens to whom it had been addressed before the Examiner came out with a characteristic knock. "As a matter of fact," says the Examiner, "the whole scheme has been cooking for some six weeks past; it is brought out in the open now that the 'antis' have declared themselves upon the subject of candidates." Incidentally the Examiner told its readers that the men who issued the call are tools of the railroad machine; such men as Charles M. Plum, a pioneer merchant whose integrity has never been questioned; Joseph D. Grant, a representative of the most substantial commercial interests of this city, who has never been identified with any public movement of questionable character; Timothy Hopkins, a capitalist who has held himself aloof from all factional, political and industrial strife; S. H. Kent, chairman of the San Francisco Builders' Exchange. These men and others of high standing in the community the Examiner has described as a pack of political intrigants intent upon furthering the designs of William F. Herrin and wrecking a reform movement. It was to be expected of course that the Examiner, or some one of our parochial dailies, would give expression to these sentiments that savor so strongly of the spirit that animates this incredible community. In this matter the Examiner has scooped its contemporaries, giving fresh demonstration as it has of the fact that in this glorious city of strife and dissension nobody can start anything without getting kicked for his pains.

The Advisability of Exhortation

It is to be hoped that the men behind the new movement will do something more than examine the qualifications of candidates. As I suggested last week, what this city needs far more than a new deal in municipal government is a new spirit in the community itself, a substitution of sweetness and light for the master passion of hatred; also, that something should be done toward disciplining our demagogic press. The spirit of dissension is fostered in this city by the small and mean minds that control our daily papers. Now while I am in favor of guarding the liberty of the press as zealously as the dragon did the Hesperian fruit; while the principle of the freedom of discussion is one to which I am ardently pledged, I conceive it to be quite reasonable for the men who have the interest of this city at heart to exhort our pestilent journalists of the parochial press to mend their mischievous ways and endeavor to approximate the behaviour of Christian gentlemen. Not long ago some of these illustrious censors were urging that steps be taken to put an end to free discussion in the weekly papers. I would not urge Mr. Plum and his confrers to go that far with the puerile dailies, but with the utmost deference I will hazard the suggestion that in the event of exhortation proving futile it might be interesting and highly beneficial to exemplify the intimacy between business office and editorial sanctum by the withdrawal of a little advertising matter.

The Source of Jacobs' Inspiration

The Hon. Isidore Jacobs and his fellow-phelanesque patriots of the Good Government League have given further proof of their staunch adherence to the brand of goodness of government which inspires their noisiest vociferations by excluding A. Comte Jr. and William Broderick from the list of supervisors that should be re-elected to office. "Arise," said the angel, "and measure the temple of God and the altar, and them that worship therein." Little Isidore Jacobs, as big and compact in virtue as in body, a soul with every virtue fraught, an Atlas, with majestic port he stands to prop the sinking State; a citizen of the kingdom of God, accepting the angel's commission he measures the worshippers within the temple and finds that Comte and Broderick are not of the required dimensions. My gorgeous palace for a hermitage I'd give to know what standard of measurement is employed by the immaculate Jacobs to discover the unfitness of Comte and Broderick and the peculiar merit of Connolly and Booth. The suspicion haunts me that this is a case where the standard is prescribed by "the viper that would depopulate the city and be every man himself." To be not less figurative but more clear, I suspect that Jacobs's standard of measurement was fashioned by the fine Italian hand of the exalted personage who has been eloquently described as the enemy of every dollar that isn't his own. The serviceable Jacobs may have reasons for his curious discrimination that are as two grains of wheat hid in two bushels of chaff, and therefore in quest of them I go not. I prefer to take counsel of the saturnine countenance that adorns not the obverse side of the two-cent stamp that has been put to sinister and base purpose. Methinks it smiles approval on the exclusion of Comte and Broderick, honest and efficient public servants, genuine friends of the people because they would scorn to coddle the people, possessed of two much self-respect to serve as the puppets of a Phelan and consequently objectionable to that illustrious employer of time-servers.

The Judge and the Professor

Apparently there is a vast difference of opinion on the subject of the nude figure in art between Professor Mortimer Clapp of Berkeley and Police Magistrate Deasy of San Francisco. According to the learned professor "art finds in the nude its greatest possibilities for achievement and expression," and "our bodies are all important from the artistic standpoint"; furthermore "clothes are only of value in so far as they convey an impression of what is beneath them." From this academic dicta Police Magistrate Deasy dissents with dogmatic emphasis, holding that art finds in the nude figure the inspiration of much that is indecent and obscene. Now Deasy is not a connoisseur of art. If you were to ask him what good is to be got out of pictures he would probably look at you in amazement. It is not likely that he is versed in the mysteries of pre-Raphaelite coloring, or that he could tell you why people are awed before Titian's Christ and overwhelmed before the glory of the setting sun in Turner's Ulysses and Polyphemus. To him perhaps the atmosphere and gleaming distances of Burne-Jones are unknown quantities. But while it may be quite true that Deasy is not learned in art his opinion in matters of art is of much greater importance than Professor Clapp's. The professor's opinion is that and nothing more: Deasy's is in the nature of a solemn decree by which the fate of a painting is pronounced. All of which was made clear enough last week. On the very day on which Professor Clapp in Berkeley expressed his opinion of the nude in art Police Magistrate Deasy banished the nude in art from a show window in San Francisco.

The Nude in Art

As a fool must now and then be right by chance, so must even a police magistrate occasionally judge shrewdly even in matters beyond the scope of his mental attainments. It is not improbable, therefore, that Deasy discriminated wisely in the matter of nude paintings. What Professor Clapp said about the nude figure is quite true. It has been said so often that it has become platitudinous. But painters have not always been without reproach in regard to the treatment of the nude figure. When a painter presents a nude figure in such a way as to make it apparent that his only purpose was to produce a figure to catch the public eye he is guilty of vulgarity and indecency. Most of the innumerable "Lady Godivas" were conceived in a spirit of vulgarity, with no sympathetic feeling for the subject, but merely as an excuse for a nude figure. Many painters have vulgarized legendary figures by tacking their names to mere studies in craftsmanship. Mere studies of the nude figure, however, are not objectionable so long as they have pictorial quality and do not pretend to be what they are not. But the whole question of the nude in art is one that is discussed too much. There are very few nude figures half so indecent as the sentiments of the people that object to them.

Deasy's Narrow Escape

While it is not improbable that Deasy discriminated wisely in the matter which I have been discussing it is far from certain that in rushing in where angels fear to tread he did not almost stumble over his own feet. We are told that one of the paintings that was "taken under advisement" by the police magistrate was from the brush of George Frederick Watts. Now if Deasy had pronounced that painting indecent, the news upon reaching England would surely evoke the derision of George Bernard Shaw who would probably bestow on him immortality of obloquy. If Shaw hears that a man was arrested in San Francisco for having one of Watts's paintings in his possession, he will doubtless explode with laughter, and perhaps he may be inspired to satirical comment for publication in the Saturday Review. Watts belongs to the early Victorian period of painters. He is steeped in early Victorian seriousness, and with him ethics is inseparable from art. He preaches in his paintings as Shaw does in his plays, but with a deep religious fervor, for the morality of Watts is the old-fashioned morality that permeates the poetry of Milton and that savors of puritanism. Yet Watts the moralist has been haled on a charge of indecency before the man that issued the blanket search warrants. From this experience Deasy should take warning.

ROYALTY AT THE ASCOT RACE MEET

The illustration shows the first of the eight landaus which formed part of the state procession from Windsor Castle to the Ascot race track. In it were King Edward, Queen Alexandra, the Prince of Wales and the Princess Victoria. The Hon. J. H. Ward and Lieut.-Colonel F. E. G. Ponsonby are shown in attendance on horseback.

She (returning from a journey)—Have you noticed that my husband displayed any emotion during my absence?

Maid—Not at first, ma'am, but today he seemed greatly depressed.

The Letter of the Law

There is in this city a red-headed policeman who believes that instructions must be obeyed to the letter though the heavens fall. When the ordinance regulating street traffic was passed, he was told by his sergeant that he must rigidly enforce its provisions. So it happened that one day he rushed from the pavement to the center of the street, and yelled to a brawny teamster, "Here, now, ye've got to keep to the right hand of the street and nixt to the curb." The teamster halted his four horses, which he had swung across the street preparatory to taking the left-hand side in order to avoid a bad hole that had been left by a gang of sewer diggers. Fastening a scornful eye on the policeman he said: "Can't you see that if I keep to the right I'll have to drive through that hole and probably bust an axle?" "Keep to the right; the law says so," retorted the policeman. Then the teamster got mad, and said in effect, but in language entirely different from the following: "Why, you idiot, I'm not going to drive twenty feet on the left-hand side. I'm just swinging far enough out to keep from running into that chuck-hole. Think I want to wreck the dray?" "I don't care what you wreck," was the reply; "I didn't make the chuck-hole, and I didn't make the law; but I'm here to infoorce the law, and if you don't keep to the right and nixt to the curb, as the ahrdinance says, I'll pinch ye." And the teamster kept next to the curb.

Since the Slot Machine Vanished

The passing of the nickel in the slot machines has resulted in wonderful politeness on the part of the cigar-store clerks. The dapper young fellow who stood behind the counter a week ago and handed out five checks for a quarter, surveyed his victim with a coldly cynical eye and looked bored at complaints over unsuccessful efforts to get something more than a small pair. Now he smiles most graciously at all who come to buy, and is most solicitous for their comfort and welfare. A week ago he secured patronage through men's propensity to gamble. The only way he can get and keep it now is by securing their good will. He is rustling for trade instead of standing calmly back and watching it come to him with a rush. It may be more than a coincidence that there have been more arrests for drunkenness since the abolition of the slot machine than there were before. It is argued by some that men must squander their money on something, and that having lost the opportunity to throw it away in watching the wheels go round they spend it in the more demoralizing pastime of diminishing the liquor supply.

The Lady Doctor (returning from a professional call)—Isn't it singular how confused one can get? It just occurs to me that instead of writing a prescription for that patient I wrote a cooking recipe.

The Blue Mouse in Bohemia

Some of the leading members of the company that played "The Blue Mouse" here enjoyed a touch of the real Bohemianism of San Francisco on Thursday evening of last week, when, in company with half a dozen or more newspapermen, they had dinner at an Italian place on Broadway. That the dining room was the rear apartment of a saloon lent interest to the occasion. Geoffrey Stein, leading man for the company, was the host. The party was characterized as "almost stag," Miss Elsa Ryan, the leading lady, being the only woman present. Her husband, A. W. Miller, manager of the company, and her three and a half year old son, Master Marshall Ambrose Miller, imparted an air of domesticity to the occasion, but did not in the least rob it of its unconventionality and freedom. In fact, the youngster was the star of the occasion, every man present being his abject slave. The Blue Mouse people were delighted with this excursion into our Latin quarter, declaring that New York could offer nothing like it. They had equal praise, for that matter, for our exclusive cafes—but queerly, for theatrical people, they preferred the obscurer places. The average Thespian delights to pose where the glitter is greatest and the crowds largest, and delights to talk of nothing else but offers from great managers and the lights and delights of Broadway. Stein's principal diversion after the show was to hie himself to a place where newspapermen congregate after their night's work is

ALAMEDA, June 29.—Angered by complaints of neighbors that his stable draws flies which pester the entire neighborhood, Samuel Hagy, a butcher, living at 871 Walnut street and conducting a market at Oak street and Santa Clara avenue, has posted a sign on his home, reading "For sale or to let, to colored people or Japanese only."

Hagy says that his stable does not draw flies, but as long as his neighbors have complained, he says he will rent the property to Orientals or negroes and get out. Hagy says "It's spite, I know, but as long as they have attacked me, I am going to give the complainers all the trouble they want."

Mrs. Charles Elliott of 872 Walnut street, J. J. Bliss of 870 Walnut street and H. V. Reeve of 874 Walnut street are taking a lively interest in Hagy's announcement, and declare that they will move if Japs or negroes become their neighbors. As to the blue mouse herself, no sooner was the curtain down than she scampered as rapidly as possible to the side of the slumbering Master Marshall Ambrose Miller. That youngster had some two inches of skin taken off his nose one day last week through being knocked down by a swing in Golden Gate Park. Some one jokingly rallied him on having tried to walk on his nose. Thereafter, whenever he was asked as to how he had hurt himself, he would grin and reply, "Was tryin' to walk on my nose."

Lola Montez the Adventuress

Lola Montez, a famous character of early days in San Francisco, has been made the subject of a biography by E. B. d'Auvergne. In "Lola Montez, an Adventuress of the 'Forties," he gives the complete history of this remarkable woman, who, after she arrived here in the days of the early rush for gold added to the fame she had already acquired abroad. As an actress at a vaudeville house of the risque variety, she was a great favorite with the rough and ready miners. A woman of great charm and beauty, she had many admirers in her train. She married one of them, Patrick Hull, a well-known newspaper man, author of "The Gardiff Giant." She had already been married in London to George Trafford Heald, an officer of the Guards, and one of the frequenters of the salon that she established in London after her banishment from Bavaria. Her father was a British officer, and her on her mother's side she descended from a long line of Spaniards—the Motalvos. She was clever, high-spirited, and possessed of an indomitable will. She was yet young when she formed a liaison with King Louis of Bavaria that was the cause of many kinds of court trouble. One minister after another implored Louis to banish her, but instead he raised Lola to a peerage, and her portrait hangs now in Bavaria in the famous Gallery of Beauties. At last, however, Louis sent her away, after she had created much political disturbance by her Protestant preachments, Bavaria being a Catholic country. She went to London, where she established her salon and married Heald, and from there she came to San Francisco. She died in one of the Eastern States in 1861 at the age of 43 years. She lies in an English cemetry, and the headstone over her grave designates her "Mrs. Eliza Gilbert." Her soldier father was named Gilbert.

A FAMOUS ADVENTURESS OF THE 'FORTIES: LOLA MONTEZ

"Lola Montez," writes Mr. d'Auvergne, "was the last of that long and illustrious line of women, reaching back beyond Cleopatra and Aspasia, before whom kings bent in homage."

Boke the Missionary

That most inspired of all teachers, Professor Boke of Berkeley, having proved a failure on the tripod, is now bloviating in the role of itinerant preacher, showing himself as usual among human affairs a visible messenger between heaven and earth. This raw young professor recently received a call from the East. It was inarticulate, but the Spreckels-Phelan cabal found it easy of interpretation and transmitted it to Boke who hurried across the continent to redeem the benighted from the stygian darkness that was lowering upon them. Notwithstanding the vigorous missionary work done by Lincoln Steffens and other muckrakers, at the close of the Calhoun trial the Eastern press showed signs of an awakening, and as a consequence our civic patriots were thrown into a panic. The New York editors had been reading the meager reports of the remarkable trial sent over the associated press wire, and naturally they were shocked and amazed at the things that were done in the name of justice in an American city. At the close of the trial the New York Sun and the New York Post published editorial comments on the graft crusade with special reference to the most recent developments. These papers, misled by Steffens and the other agents of the Spreckels-Phelan cabal, were formerly in sympathy with the Graft Prosecution, but during the Calhoun trial a change came over the spirit of their views and at its conclusion their comments revealed a change of attitude, thus rendering imperative the shipping of Boke across the continent with a cargo of the familiar misinformation with which the Boughten Bulletin has been regaling its unsophisticated readers. So Boke is now on duty arresting public sentiment in the East. He has been telling the Eastern editors how the higher-ups have been poisoning the public mind in California through the medium of the all-powerful weekly press. Which reminds we of a paragraph that I came across lately in John Morley's "Robespierre":

> The pedant, cursed with the ambition to be a ruler of men, is a curious study. He would be glad not to go too far, and yet his chief dread is lest he be left behind. His consciousness of pure aims allows him to become an accomplice in the worst crimes. Suspecting himself at bottom to be a theorist, he hastens to clear his character as man of practice by conniving at an enormity.

A Voice in the Wilderness

Walker C. Graves, an attorney, writing to the Chronicle, says that he disapproves of the Graft Prosecution because of the practice of filling the record with errors and then condemning the appellate courts because those courts in the performance of their solemn duties, under their oaths, set aside verdicts on account of the errors which have been committed knowingly and wantonly. Welcome Mr. Graves! I am glad to hail a member of the legal profession who appreciates the enormity of the practice that I have been complaining of for nearly two years. What Mr. Graves asserts is a truth with which the members of the bar of the whole State are familiar, but, alas! there are few among them with the courage to protest against the outrages that have brought discredit and disgrace on our courts. In the course of time no doubt, when the obsession relaxes and sanity regains possession of the public mind lawyers will come to the front to assert that they deeply deplored the mischievous methods of the mountebanks of reform who so confused the perceptive faculties of the people as to induce toleration of the most infamous crimes that it is possible to commit against the State. But the Bar of California by its complaisance during the dark period of conspiracy has convicted itself of arrant cowardice.

Ignorance or Worse?

Infinitely worse than any crime which the prosecution cabal has sought to punish is this very practice of contemptuously ignoring the rules of evidence and daring the appellate courts to exact obedience to the law. Had this practice been connived at by the trial judges the ugliness of it would be enormously heightened, for in addition to the criminal aspect of such connivance we should have the hypocritical attitude of the ministers of justice who affect a burning hatred of iniquity and who have stigmatized Ruef as the greatest criminal of the century. Lawyers have told me that the errors with which the records reek in these graft cases are so flagrant and obvious that even Boke must be cognizant of them; that they are so greatly at variance with elementary principles as to compel the conclusion that they were not countenanced through ignorance however profound. It is deemed inconceivable that these judges who, I am told, were under no misapprehension regarding the misdeeds of the officials who were corrupted by Ruef, should be insensible of the enormity of their own conduct. Can it be possible that like the men behind the graft prosecution the judges themselves passionately hating the men that obstructed them in their early misdemeanors plunged headlong into high crimes in the desperate hope of rehabilitating themselves in the blinding glory of an ultimate triumph? Conceding such to be the case what a lesson for civic patriots is to be read in the history of this crusade against graft for the gratification of personal animosities! How dramatic the denouement revealing as it does the heroes transformed into rogues blacker than the rascals that served as the motif of their virtuous enterprise.

A David of the Bar

It is refreshing at this time, marked as it is by a lamentable scarcity of courageous lawyers, to read the sentiments boldly and eloquently uttered at St. Mary's College in Oakland by Andrew S. Burke of the class of '04. "For two years," said Mr. Burke at a meeting of the college alumni, "the highest courts of our State have been subjected to a campaign of villainy, of calumniation and despicable misrepresentation that outstrips almost the wildest flights of imagination. Public frenzy, spurred by a boughten and corrupt press, has sought by the intimidation of courts and juries to produce results that legitimate means could not procure. The paid puppets of private interest and the servient tools of private prejudice have carried on a war that amazes by the iniquity of its pur-

Gratulation and Ingratitude

It is difficult to decide which is the harder to suffer—the ingratitude of a republic or the excessive gratitude of a native town swelling with pride over the achievements of its sons. The first produces starvation, as instance the case of the old soldiers in the veterans' homes who have been fed by charity because Congress failed to appropriate sufficient money for food supplies. The second is conducive to gout, for proof of which observe the reception that the Wright brothers have been given by the city of Dayton, where they were reared. Dayton laughed at them a few years ago—stuck its tongue in its cheek and winked in a smart-aleck way over the antics of those crazy Wright boys, who had a darned sight better be attending to their bicycle repairing business, by thunder, than monkeying with flying machines. And now that they are enjoying a measure of success the town is giving them of its best—not particularly for their glorification, but principally for its own. Their sister, who stuck to her brothers through every discouragement, was known only a few years ago as "that Wright girl." Now she is Miss Wright, sister of the men who have conquered the air, who have associated with kings. "Let me talk to the man who has talked to a king," is the cry in Dayton now. And, "By Jimminy, I always knew them Wright boys would get along" is heard from every tongue. And the village cutup says, "I knew they'd come out all"—but my typewriter staggers at the pun.

her name and she need only sign the agreement; that before the date of delivery they would dispose of the set at a substantial advance for her benefit. So she signed the notes presented to her which she now refuses to pay. Mrs. Dickinson's experience is an old story. The book business in this country has become next of kin to the gold brick swindle. All sorts of sinister stratagems are practiced for the deception of the unwary, but there is none more successful than that of offering something for nothing. The book-canvasser's favorite method of ingratiating himself is that of soliciting a laudatory notice for the work which he wishes to sell. The person approached is flattered at the suggestion that owing to his standing in the community a few words of commendation from him will stimulate business, and he signs the agreement without reading between the lines. The scheme seems to be the natural successor of the edition-de-luxe-signed-and-numbered trick so popular a few years ago, which led the illiterate millionaires and unliterary culturines into the belief that they were acquiring valuable libraries which would become priceless within the cycle of their own lives but which, alas! when a slump in paper fortunes made ready coin a necessity to them, proved to be of but little more commercial worth than their elaborate bindings. A good book has no more need of a "name" to back it, save perhaps that of its author, than has a good dollar, and as the reputable publishing business is in the hands of firms whose names are well known to all lovers of books, there is no need for any one to suffer by becoming entangled through the misrepresentations of obscure and unknown fakers. In nearly every instance these "valuable libraries" are composed of the works on which copyright has expired, and a good, serviceable single volume of any of them can be obtained for fifty cents. Mrs. Dickinson has been asked to pay at the rate of one hundred and fifty dollars a volume.

Convention Missionaries

The special delegates to the annual meeting of the National Education Association at Denver which convenes on July 5th, left yesterday determined to return with the acceptance of the association of California's invitation to hold the 1910 meeting in San Francisco. To this end a good quantity of preliminary work has been accomplished by the committee organized on June 1st at the headquarters of the California Promotion Committee. The co-operation of the city and county superintendents of schools and boards of education as well as that of the commercial organizations of the State has been secured, and headquarters have been arranged for in Denver for the accommodation of the California delegation at the Brown Palace Hotel, the headquarters of the Association during the convention. Literature and soil products of California counties will be used as partial inducements and will be features on exhibition at the headquarters.

OUR UNIQUE BOOK PUBLISHER

A. M. Robertson, that unique figure in the business life of San Francisco, is now in his new bookstore in the Robertson building on Union Square. In place of the "sale" that usually heralds the migration of business quarters, Robertson celebrated the event by publishing two new books, "The Shadow on the Dial," a volume of essays by Ambrose Bierce, and a "Bibliography of the Chinese Question in the United States," by Boutwell Dunlap and Robert E. Cowan. The new store which has the quiet bookish air of an old English library reveals something of the personality of the pioneer publisher and bookseller, a paradoxical business man who is vain of his losses and who boasts of the fact that he never sells books at a "cut price." He has curious ideas about keeping faith with publishers and authors that would seem to be too quixotic for success in an American city, but Robertson is one of the personalities of San Francisco and to book lovers his coming downtown is the important thing in the restoration of the old familiar order of things.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks: Last week's session was a typical ante-holiday affair. The steadiness of prices speaks well for the stability of values at this time and the easiness of money seems to dispel the fears of pool liquidation on a large scale. Foreign investment buying is reported and the odd-lot demand from investors has increased materially. Considerable attention is being paid to the news from Washington and it is not thought that the corporation tax will enter the situation as a disturbing influence. Railroad earnings are very encouraging and barring unfavorable developments over the holidays we should not be surprised to see values higher next week.

Wheat: Traders for the week closed the market somewhat unsettled. There was a combination of bearish features which forced prices lower. Weather conditions fine. Southwest points are sending bearish estimates on movement on new wheat for next week. For the present there is less cash demand. Stocks at the Northwest points did not decrease as much as for the previous weeks. A few reports from the sections where harvesting and threshing have been in progress this week are a little more flattering than expected. It was noticeable, however, that a number of the strongest interests were good buyers of wheat on resting orders for all months at the early decline. The buying of September was especially good during early part of week and later some of the big cash and elevator people were buying that month. It will take perfect weather and increased offerings from the new crop to justify the position of the sellers. Anything in the way of bullish influence early next week, coupled with the important buying by good people should bring about a decided change of sentiment and recovery in prices.

Cotton: Just as the constant dropping of water wears away the hardest stone, so the reiteration of poor crop accounts has awakened the trade to a realization of the precarious promise for another cotton yield. The trade was first moved to action by the unexpectedly bad showing made by Georgia and Alabama, in the summary of crop conditions published by the New York Journal of Commerce. Day after day this newspaper related the hazardous situation in all cotton States, except Texas and Oklahoma, reflecting which prices rose steadily until 11.60 was reached. At this point general liquidation set in as traders seemed to fear that the Government figures would not be lower than 78 to 80 against 81.2 in 1908, but the market took the liquidation well and when the last of the timid longs had evened up prices were still around the highest levels of the season. When the official figures of 74.6 were made known by the Agricultural Department the shorts were swept completely off their feet and the wave of new buying carried prices to 12.15 in a very few minutes and might have gone still higher but for the week-end liquidation and three days' holidays in honor of the glorious Fourth. The indifference of spinners in certain quarters to actual cotton was suddenly terminated and simultaneously a demand for cotton at every important market in the South arose and spots were advanced one-half to three-quarters of a cent, but the rise failed to draw out any fresh and unseen supplies or to disclose any hiding place where cotton has been held for 12 cents thus confirming facts already known to many, that the supply of cotton on the farms and in the uncounted towns is unprecedentedly low even for the first week in July. There could have been no better combination of influences to advance prices than the confirmation of small crop ideas by the United States Government and an active demand for cotton at firm prices with offerings remaining scant. The rise has therefore throughout the week been logical. To what extent the natural tendency was accentuated or enlarged by speculation the excess advance in options over spots should show, but even though it may be said that speculation alone was responsible for half th erise, it is not necessarily true that so much is insecure. Speculation discounts the future, and if anticipations regarding crop losses are realized the advance can readily be maintained. Further damage indeed could readily bring much higher prices.

The Clan Martin

"Peter Martin will make his home abroad," says an Examiner headline; "Son of San Francisco's society leader says he will live permanently in Paris." In the course of the interview beneath this headline Mr. Peter Martin doesn't say that he intends to live permanently abroad, but whatever this particular Peter Martin did say is perhaps of no interest to anybody in this city, for it is evident that he is not our "Peter." Some other Martin—perhaps one of the Bradley-Martin clan has been confounded with Dowager Eleanor's son and heir. According to the Examiner's despatch the Mrs. Peter Martin of the interview is the niece of the late Hermann Oelrichs. Assuredly the niece of the late Hermann Oelrichs is the daughter-in-law of Mrs. Eleanor Martin, but in going into this detail of kinship the interviewer brought about confusion worse confounded. There is one thing certain, and that is that Mrs. Peter Martin of Burlingame and Newport has not become a mother since we last saw her; yet according to the Examiner's interview, the Peter Martins who arrived in New York last Wednesday on the Kron Prinzessin Cecelie were accompanied by their baby daughter "who had never before seen this country." Furthermore: the Peter Martins interviewed for the Examiner have been in Europe four years, and they "hardly remember anything about America except in a general way." It gave them a thrill to see the old statue of Liberty looming up down the harbor. The Peter Martins of Burlingame and Newport have been abroad a length of time that is nearer four months than four years.

Jimmy Was Not There

With the Sullivan-Murphy wedding the gaieties of the city ended and a belated summer calm has settled over everything. A few straggling bridge parties alone are breaking the Sabbath stillness, and over the afternoon teacups the wedding presents received by Mrs. Frederic Murphy are still being discussed, for no bride of the past few seasons can boast a more goodly array. Perhaps the best gift of all was that given by her parents in memory of the occasion to St. Bridgid's church—the organ that received its christening at her nuptial mass. From her large family connections the bride's most wonderful gifts came, her aunt, Miss Mollie Phelan, presenting her with one hundred and eighty pieces of flat silver, a magnificent tea service in heavy silver and a Tiffany lamp. And by the way, both Miss Phelan and her brother Jimmy were conspicuously absent from the wedding breakfast, which lasted until nearly six o'clock. Uncle Jimmy, however, was well represented for his set of silver plates and ramikins were among the costliest of the presents. Many priceless pieces of jewelry fell to Alyce's lot, among them the large diamond frog, which was the gift of the groom. From "Mother-in-love," as the bride has affectionately termed Mrs. Murphy Senior, came the handsome hand carved tables and chairs made of teak wood. Already two or three large teas have been planned in honor of the young couple on their return and the bridal party hope to have one or two more jolly reunions before the departure of the Dunns for their Eastern home. And that reminds me that Alice Dunne has made quite a hit here socially and will be most sincerely mourned on her departure. Not only is she pretty and attractive, but she is also a very bright vivacious type and with her brother Duval has been much in demand at every week-end house party out of town.

Where the Tender Passion Thrives

From San Rafael comes word that Cupid has been very busy across the bay all summer and that before the fall there will be several interesting engagements announced. Most of these romances blossomed at Hotel Rafael. Here is an ideal spot for the play of the tender passion as it has a most romantic setting, near enough to San Francisco for the daily trip to be made and just remote enough away to seem far from the madding crowd. May Sutton was the first to set the pace, for while her name has been coupled for some months with that of Mr. Ham, it is generally conceded that the finishing touches were added between tennis matches on the Rafael court. There are now two other equally interesting engagements shortly to be forthcoming, and at the coming wedding on the fifteenth of Mary Foster and John Keuchler. San Rafaelites assure me. Lou Foster's engagement will be made public. The fortunate man, they add, is Evan Evans, the eldest of the three attractive Evans boys, who for the most part make their home in San Rafael.

The Montanya Tragedy

Perhaps if the truth had been told outright there would have been no suggestion of mystery with reference to Mrs. de la Montanya's sensational withdrawal from this easy-going sun-loving world. But it is the habit of reporters, when they find they have been deceived, to make it as disagreeable as possible for those that practiced the deception. A lot of plausible and excusable lying was done in the interest of the gentlemen who were enjoying Mrs. de la Montanya's hospitality at the time she made her abrupt and discourteous exit, and as a result those gentlemen were called upon to do some explaining which they did without convincing. Their story doesn't ring true. The tone is unusual. It strikes the ear with shocking unfamiliarity like the music of strange islands that corals build or submarine volcanoes upheave. And now there are rumors of acquaintance that blossomed into affection, of affection that bloomed into love and love that blazed into adoration. It is all very strange, fantastic and extravagant—the combination of lillies, clairvoyants and cocktails, of the melancholia of lost illusions, and the madness of moonlight, of married men and grass widows, absent-minded officials and accommodating doctors. Yet women have done all that Mrs. de la Montanya has done and will do them again and men will love them none the less.

Here are shown some of the latest novelties in fashion in Paris, where a new but seldom unbecoming innovation in dress makes its appearance every week.

Before Her Marriage

An eventful and somewhat checkered career was that which Mrs. de la Montanya brought to a tragic close. Years ago when she was "Birdie" Barbier the bavardes of the daily press devoted a good deal of space to her doings. Long before her marriage to Montanya she was reported to be deeply in love with a prominent business man of this city. He went to Dawson and she followed him, and the newspapers reported that they were to be married in the Klondike. The marriage was indefinitely postponed. It was shortly before that that "Birdie" Barbier was bequeathed a fortune by her sister, Mrs. Harry Emeric, which involved her in litigation with her brother-in-law, the outcome of which was a compromise by which she accepted a comparatively small sum of money. Emeric, by the way, had been treated rather shabbily by his wife. By marrying her he incurred the disfavor of his wealthy father who at one time owned a large part of Contra Costa County. Cast out of his father's home Harry Emeric was obliged to become a street car driver to support himself and wife. The father never forgave him, but at the old man's death the son inherited the family fortune which he proceeded to enjoy in royal fashion. He indulged his wife in the most extravagant luxuries, and they appeared to be very happy and very much in love. One day Harry Emeric fell ill, and believing that he was on his deathbed he deeded all his property to his wife. He soon recovered and about the same time discovered that his wife had grown cold. He demanded his property back and she refused to give it to him. While they were squabbling over it Mrs. Emeric died, leaving a will by which she bequeathed the property to her sister. Hardly had Emeric succeeded in recovering the bulk of his property when he died.

The Montanya Kidnaping Case

James de la Montanya figured in the newspapers long before he married "Birdie" Barbier. His first wife was Loraine Spencer, daughter of Judge Frank Spencer of San Jose whom he cruelly deserted, later kidnaping their children and removing them from the jurisdiction of the California courts. To prevent his wife from regaining possession of the children he became a citizen of France where he lived for several years. In time it became necessary for him to return to this country to protect his business interests and as a consequence he was obliged to yield possession of the children to their mother. One of them is now Mrs. Edward Davis. The first Mrs. de la Montanya is now Mrs. George Terbush.

A Divorce Dinner

Divorce decrees might have been appropriate table decorations at the quiet little dinner that preceded Mrs. de la Montanya's death. The hostess had just been divorced. "Bob" Hanford, one of the guests, had divorced his wife and married a divorced woman. Mrs. Patton had never sued or been sued for a decree, her husband, William Patton, a prominent Virginia City mining man, having died several years ago; but two of her husband's sisters had the bonds broken that bound them to their spouses. Mrs. Patton, who has several young children, was formerly Miss Margaret Rodrique. Her late husband's mother and sisters moved from Virginia City to San Francisco several years ago, and have been prominent socially here and in San Rafael. One sister, Miss Edith Patton, married Frank Wilds of Virginia City. She was eventually divorced from him and afterward married Leonard Chenery of this city. Another sister, Miss Jessie Patton, married William Berry of San Rafael. She, too, is divorced. Miss Dorothy Ethel Patton went to New York, where she studied to be a trained nurse, and later went abroad. Hanford's first wife was Miss Marguerite Harley of Montreal, Canada. Great surprise was occasioned by their divorce some years ago. Hanford then married his present wife, Mrs. Gabrielle Cavalsky, who had just been divorced from her husband, who was a dentist. The second Mrs. Hanford is now in New York, and the handsome Hanford home on Russian Hill has been on the market. Hanford's first wife went to her mother's home in Montreal after the divorce, and it is said that she never recovered from the episode, still loving Hanford. Late letters report her in London with American friends during Ascot week, and later she joined Mrs. E. Walton Hedges, who has taken a house in Wales for the summer. Hanford settled a generous fortune upon her at the time of the divorce.

Six Footers Wanted

The lamentable fact has been discovered that San Francisco society is lacking in men who stand six feet in height, and as a consequence the Portola Committee is having a hard time picking the hundred who are to act as a body-guard to Queen Vergilia during her reign as ruler of our merry October festival. Queen Vergilia not being a diminutive lady, it is necessary that the men who ride as her escort in the pageant be strapping big fellows. And there are not a hundred of that variety among the eligible youth of San Francisco. It has been suggested that the committee go out and select some of the guard from among the men who ride the ranges; but it is feared that our exquisites would object to riding with mere cattle punchers. Such being the case, why not give our democratic queen a complete cowbody guard?

Gallant Colonel Karmanny

The projection of Colonel Lincoln Karmanny of the Marine Corps into the affairs of the Butters family as a suitor for the hand of Mrs. Cook is, I believe, somewhat premature, for if I am not mistaken that gallant officer has not yet been divorced. Colonel Karmanny is a man of fine presence and physique and a great social favorite. When he was stationed in Honolulu many years ago, in the days when all roads led to the beautiful home of the popular Afong sisters it was rumored that he was a suitor for the hand of one of them. The Colonel is a brave and efficient officer. He served with distinction at the battle of Santiago and during the strenuous days of our big fire he had command of the detachment of Marines which won the admiration and gratitude of the people by heroic achievements.

The Ansley-Kurtz Engagement

A recently announced engagement is that of Miss Florence Ansley, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Langdon Ansley of Santa Cruz, and Dr. Benjamin Putman Kurtz, son of Dr. and Mrs. Kurtz of Piedmont. Miss Ansley is a graduate of the University of California. Dr. Kurtz is a prominent member of the Bohemian and University Clubs. The wedding will take place in the fall, and the couple will reside in Piedmont.

Proletariot Disappointed

Although Prince Walter Vretman was acquitted in Oakland of the charge of passing a check without having sufficient funds to meet it, the public is left with a feeling of great dissatisfaction, which, however, does not grow out of the nobleman's release from jail—for who wants to see royalty in dungeons? But Vretman announced that when his case came to trial he would make revelations that would not only astound but demoralize local society. Society breathes more easily at his failure to do so—but the proletariot feels justly aggrieved.

The Nelson Estate

The threatened will contest over the estate of the late lumberman, Captain Charles Nelson, has been averted, Judge Wells of Oakland having issued letters testamentary to the decedent's daughter, Mrs. Margaret Bresse, and James Tyson, a nephew and former business associate. Mrs. Bresse will have the income from half the estate, which in time will go to Meta Nelson McMahon, her daughter by her first husband, from whom she was divorced. Mrs. Bresse's stepmother is to receive one-third of the estate, and several nephews get $2500 each. When Captain Nelson died it was thought that his estate would total about $1,000,000, but Mrs. Bresse testified before Judge Wells that it is only half that amount.

Commander McCracken Retired

Among the well known navy officers retired recently is Commander Alexander McCracken of the West Virginia. Mrs. McCracken was formerly Miss Isabel McPherson, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Maynard McPherson, prominent in the exclusive southern circles here. Their friends are hoping that the McCrackens will conclude to settle in California.

Afraid of Elinor Glyn

The presentation here of the dramatic version of Mrs. Elinor Glyn's novel "Three Weeks," recalls an episode which took place during Mrs. Glyn's visit to California. While she was at Santa Barbara she was introduced to a handsome San Francisco youth of twenty, who was at Santa Barbara with his mother. When the introduction took place, the youth had just returned from a dip in the surf, and looked pink and godlike. Mrs. Glyn held his hand, while she surveyed him with the greatest of satisfaction. Then she remarked soulfully, "Do you know, you remind me so much of my own Paul!" The boy's mother, a most cautious body, heard the remark. She suddenly had to go to her room, and her son must accompany her. Also he was shipped back to the city on the next train.

Society in San Rafael

San Rafael was the Mecca of most of our prominent social lights over the fourth. Not only did the balls at the Hotel Rafael and the Marin Country Club prove drawing cards, but the tennis tournament on the hotel tennis court brought together one of the biggest society crowds of the season. Nearly every house in San Rafael had a gay party for the event and many of the Burlingame set motored up for the occasion, among them being Tom Driscoll who so recently captured the trophy offered down the peninsula. Belated applicants for rooms, with debutantes to chaperone at the balls, had to be refused at the hotel, and some reserved rooms had also to be canceled, for the tennis champions' groups of admiring friends arrived at the last moment and had to be accommodated. A looker on assures me that at least one thousand enthusiastic spectators witnessed the game that made May Sutton again the champion. The court itself admits five hundred people and those outside numbered another five hundred. May Sutton declares that she was nervous before the play began; also that when she is nervous she makes the best plays. Be that as it may she deserves all kinds of credit for she played against the popular feeling. Miss Hotchkiss being on home soil received a most enthusiastic backing, her playing being hailed with ringing cheers, while Miss Sutton, until towards the end, received but feeble applause. May Sutton is a bright, breezy type of girl, and is a general favorite. And that reminds me—she says she will not formally announce her engagement until her return from the East, but those who have been sitting up and taking notes say they think the wedding bells are scheduled to ring in the late fall on the return of her fiance from Mexico.

Singer Will Return

Mrs. Louise Wright McClure, who a year ago made her debut in Oakland as a singer under the stage name of "Louise Byrd," (one of her family names), has just completed a very successful tour in the East, and will soon return to her home in Oakland, where she will be the guest of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Stuart Selden Wright. Mrs. McClure is a tall, striking brunette with a fine stage presence and a beautiful mezzo-soprano voice, which her friends hope to hear in concert while she is here, despite the fact that her visit is in the nature of a rest and vacation. Mrs. McClure comes from a family tree which includes the Braxtons and the Pages, Thomas Nelson Page being a relative. Her mother was Maria Byrd Hopkins, daughter of the late Commodore William E. Hopkins, U. S. N. Drs. Edward K. and William Hopkins are her brothers. The late Judge Selden Wright was Mrs. McClure's grandfather.

The Commander's Darlings

The three small sons of the commanding officer at one of the army posts about the bay are veritable enfants terrible who make life miserable for everyone, from the ranking officer down to the latest recruit, and more than once temptation has been strong to risk rank and promotion for the satisfaction of administering to them a badly needed spanking. Recently one of the subordinate officers rang up the driver of the quartermaster's wagon with the order, "Mike, you are to go down to the depot and bring up a trunk for the colonel. It belongs to his new maid." "His what?" queried Mike. "Why, the new maid he has just got for those boys," answered the lieutenant. "A maid, is it?" came back from Mike. "Well, 'tis not a maid he wants for those kids, 'tis a policeman."

Colored Photographs

In the Colonial ball room at the St. Francis Friday evening will be given a beautiful exhibition of lantern-slides photographed in colors direct from nature. This is the greatest advance made in photography since Daguerre's original discovery in 1839. Two young gentlemen from Denver, Stanley McGinnis and George F. Clifton, have achieved the most successful results. They are now touring California. The pictures are shown in the stereopticon and include exquisite studies in still life, flowers of brilliant colors, animals, street scenes, child and costume studies and portraits. They show many charming landscapes taken in Colorado, Oregon and California, as well as some views of the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition.

Mr. and Mrs. Carl Raiss will spend the summer at The Peninsula.

In the Social Spotlight

Miss Julia Thomas is visiting Miss Gertrude Perry at Ross Valley. In August she will go to San Diego on a visit to her sister, Mrs. J. W. Sefton (Helen Thomas). Miss Sidney Davis will also visit Mrs. Sefton for a few weeks.

Miss Bernice Wilson, daughter of the Alexander Wilsons, is back from the east, where she has been visiting her sister, Mrs. Claude Smith.

Mr. and Mrs. T. Carey Friedlander are frequent entertainers at The Peninsula.

Mrs. P. H. Remillard and daughter have returned to Hotel Rafael after an absence of a week at different points of interest.

Among those registered from Pasadena this week at Hotel Rafael, are William R. Staats, Mr. and Mrs. Marcus A. Hall, Frank H. Rider and Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Stubbs.

Miss Enid Gregg has returned from a delightful trip to the Yosemite.

Mrs. William Taylor gave a bridge party in San Rafael last week. Exquisite prizes and dainty refreshments were rewards of the guests.

Mr. and Mrs. Harold Havens, Mr. and Mrs. Wicksham Havens of Piedmont went down to Del Monte in two motor cars for the Independence Day holidays.

The Tea Room of the St. Francis is filled nearly every afternoon after the matinee with smart society maids and matrons who find this a delightful rendezvous where one can always find a number of one's friends. Among a group noted Wednesday afternoon were Misses Elizabeth Newhall, Martha Calhoun, Augusta Foute, Inez Keeney, Peggie Simpson, Marion Newhall,

A Most Charming Widow

"The Merry Widow" was a long time in arriving here; but she comes unfrayed and unworn, no sign of age in her dimpled face, no fatigue in her rippling voice,—naught but suppleness in her limbs, and a world of charm and gayety in her music. She is indeed a merry widow—a sprightly, unsorrowing widow, whose only aim in life, for a time, is to make every man she meets propose to her. But she narrows down to one when love comes, and lavishes all her allurements on him and in the end she gains him. The company that is presenting the play at the Van Ness Theatre is one of excellence all through, with two or three people of exceptional merit. It is seldom that a man so capable as George Dameral is seen in musical comedy—a man who can sing, dance and act. He plays the Prince whose love for the widow, Sonia, is the theme of the play. Dameral possesses not only a good voice and presence, but is full of youthful vitality that is reflected in every move he makes, in every word he says. As graceful, quick and agile as a cat, he shows to wonderful advantage in the Marsovian dances, and in the famous waltz with Sonia. She is not a whit his inferior in grace of movement—and to the seductive strains of Franz Lehar's music the two of them sway and glide around the stage as lightly, as spontaneously, as willows do in the wind. They had to repeat this dance many times before the audience would release them. Mabel Wilber is Sonia, whom the Marsovian ambassador insists Prince Danilo shall marry that her fortune may rescue Marsovia from bankruptcy. While she is not a woman of remarkable beauty, she has a most graceful figure, a sweet though light voice, and a personal magnetism that would make up for even serious defects. She is at her sprightliest with a train of admirers at her heels—but at her best in her love scenes with the prince, which she plays with charming womanliness. But it must be remembered that there are other people in the cast than these two. Oscar Figman as the old ambassador plays the part with quiet and effective humor. San Francisco's old favorite, Tommy Leary, looking not a whit more aged than he did fifteen years ago, plays Nish, the messenger, with bubbling humor. Theresa Zan Brune as the ambassador's wife, is a very luminous secondary star, and John O'Donnell as the lovelorn one is sufficiently absurd and ridiculous. The piece is beautifully staged and costumed, and this, with its wonderfully captivating music and beautiful songs, makes it a three hours' delight. The chorus works splendidly, doing the Marsovian dances with exciting abandon, and kicking up a rumpus in the scene at Maxime's that has the house in continual applause.

The New Chutes

Amusement lovers are looking forward to the opening of the new Fillmore street Chutes which is to unlock its turnstiles for the first time next Wednesday. That many surprises are in store is certain, and not the least of these will be the acts on the open-air program. All of the many attractions from band to dare-devil riders are being brought from the east and each is a headliner in a distinct class. Exceptional for the daring which enters into his work, will be the act of Desperado, a high diver of eastern fame. The average diver leaps into water but Desperado's fall is broken by the mouth of a wooden chute which he strikes with his chest and along which he is projected at terrific speed. As great an acrobat as any of the tumblers and a premier musician as well, is Senor Guiseppi Sirignano, conductor of the Royal Banda Roma which is to be the principal musical attraction at Wednesday's opening. The band was imported from Italy by the management of the New York Hippodrome and is coming to the new Chutes from Dreamland, Coney Island. It has created a furore in the east. Sirignano is a conductor of the gymnastic type. He leads with more gyrations than the realistic Creatore and, it is said, seems to be in all portions of the band-stand at once. With all his antics, which are as entertaining to auditors as the music itself, Sirignano is a splendid musician. The Banda Roma accompanies Mme. Ermin Arnolde, prima donna soprano. Among the many other free attractions will be Florence Spray, the world's greatest lady high diver, who will appear in the latest creations in sea shore garments, and Demon, who will ride the length of the chutes on a bicycle enveloped in flames. Band, soloists and sensationalists will perform every afternoon and night beginning next Wednesday.

Fitch Comedy at Alcazar

"The Frisky Mrs. Johnson," a Clyde Fitch comedy, is announced as the Alcazar's attraction for the coming week. Florence Roberts regards it as one of the best vehicles in her repertoire. She starred in it one whole season, under Frederic Belasco's direction. Certainly it affords her abundant opportunity for display of her versatility. All the scenes are laid in Paris, but the principal people are Americans, with one Englishman prominent in the plot. Mrs. Johnson's married life has not been extremely happy, her husband having become enamored of, and finally eloping with, a chorus girl; so when the plays opens her opinion of the possibility of marital felicity is rather equivocal. She has taken up her residence at the home of her younger sister, Mrs. Frank Morley, and the masculine admirers in her train are numerous and varied of character and position when Jim Morley, brother of her sister's husband and a man of splendid attainments, visits the house, meets Mrs. Johnson and falls in love with her. In the meantime Mrs. Morley has been indiscreet with Lord Bertie Heathcote, and discovery of her imprudence by her husband is imminent when Mrs. Johnson takes the blame upon her own shoulders, thus saving her sister's reputation and losing the esteem of Jim. The remainder of the play is devoted to straightening out the tangle thus created. Florence Roberts is cast as Mrs. Johnson, Thurlow Bergen as Jim Morley, E. L. Bennison as his brother, Ernest Glendenning as Lord Bertie, William Carwood as Lal Birkenread, Norval MacGregor as Professor Chardly, Andrew Bennison as Bowler, Roy Neill as a page boy, Burt Wesner as Monsieur Max Dindeau, Charles Trowbridge as Bolee, Louise Brownell as Mrs. Frank Morley, Christie MacLean as Mrs. Chardly, Diana Argall as Mrs. Bowler and Claribel Becker as a maid. When the play was presented in the old Alcazar, about six years ago, it scored a three-weeks' run.

Murray and Mack Coming

Murray and Mack, the popular comedians, are coming to San Francisco for a limited engagement and will present tomorrow afternoon at the American Theatre their frivolous musical comedy "A Night on Broadway." Murray and Mack played ten weeks in Los Angeles changing their bill weekly and while each of their many offerings are said to be very funny, "A Night on Broadway" is reported to be the best of the ten. A lot of clever people make up the cast which assists in the untangling of a most laughable plot, and there are plenty of musical offerings to keep the entertainment up to a delightful pitch. Blossom Seeley appears in the soubrette roles and she brings her famous vaudeville specialties. She is said to be all action and to possess that rare personal magnetism that in itself spells "success." Ollie Mack, the popular comedian with Murray and Mack, is known the world over for his quick Irish wit and humor. In "A Night on Broadway" he has the best part he ever played. This, considered with the fact that the members of his company are all well known performers, augmented with a big chorus of pretty girls, makes this show one of the best of its kind that has played in this city for several months. According to press reports from other cities where "A Night on Broadway" has been presented a first class show is coming to the American Theatre tomorrow afternoon. Augustus Thomas' "The Witching Hour" will be the first of the Shubert attractions at the American Theatre early in September.

Novelty at the Orpheum

A genuine novelty will be presented next week at the Orpheum in the shape of a one act grand opera entitled "The Patriot," by those well known writers of verse and music, Stanislaus Stange and Julian Edwards. Its action takes place during the American revolution at the time when the English government was offering a reward of $25,000 for the capture of George Washington, who is saved from a bloody death at the hands of the Tories by a young girl named Marion who purposely changes the apartment in which Washington is to sleep and perishes in his stead. The principal singer will be Helena Frederick, a gifted dramatic soprano of most attractive appearance and a graceful, sympathetic and forceful actress. Miss Frederick will be supported by Huntington May, Pacie Ripple, Fred Hanley, John Rogers, J. V. Prescott, James Wall and the old Tivoli favorite William Schuster. Other attractions for next week will be The Three Leightons, among the most popular comedians of the Orpheum Circuit, in a new version of "A One Night Stand in Minstrelsy"; Selma Braatz, the feminine cinquivalei and the greatest of all European feminine jugglers; and Charlotte Parry, an extraordinary protean artist whose versality and ability are exhibited in an interesting one act play called "The Comstock Mystery" in which she impersonates seven separate and distinct characters in rapid succession. Next week will conclude the engagements of the Three Athletas, Armstrong and Clark, Herr Londe and Fraulein Tilly and George Hillman and his Redpath Napanees. A new series of Orpheum Motion Pictures will be an interesting finale to one of the best of vaudeville entertainments.

Triumph of "L'Amico Fritz"

The presentation for the first time in this country of Mascagni's opera, "L'Amico Fritz," has resulted in a glorious triumph for the International Grand Opera Company at the Princess Theatre and it is safe to predict that it will be repeated to crowded houses for press and public are unanimous in its favor. Another musical event of great importance was the first appearance of the famous tenor, Samoiloff, as Otello on Thursday evening. The programes for the coming week will be as follows: Monday night and Saturday matinee, Mascagni's "L'Amico Fritz" with Bertossi, Colombini, Arcangeli and the same splendid cast as was given on its first production; Tuesday night "Il Trovatore" with Therry and Samoiloff; Wednesday matinee, "Lucia" with Norelli and Bari; Wednesday evening, "Otello" with Bertossi, Samoiloff and Arcangeli; Thursday and Sunday nights, first times this season, "Giaconda" with Therry, Bari, Arcangeli and Gravina; Friday evening, "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "I Pagliacci" with Samoiloff; Saturday night, "Rigoletto" with Norelli.

Slum Drama for Oakland

Next Monday evening the Bishop Players at the Liberty Playhouse will offer the first Oakland production of "The Regeneration," Owen Kildare and Walter Hackett's powerful drama of East Side life in New York City, in which Arnold Daly and a notable cast scored such a great hit in Gotham last season. "The Regeneration" in many ways, is very similar to "Salvation Nell," Mrs. Fiske's present vehicle. The scenes of both plays are taken from the same part of the metropolis, and the subject dealt with is practically the same; but in "The Regeneration" it is handled in an entirely different manner. An excerpt from a criticism which appeared the morning after the play's first presentation in Philadephia gives a good idea of what it is like. In part it read, "We consider 'The Regeneration' easily the strongest play produced in Philadelphia during the present season. Owen Kildare shows us life—not the sort of life we are very familiar with or glad to become acquainted with—yet life nevertheless, and if anyone can sit through a performance of the play without realizing better than before, why it is that criminals seldom reform, he must be of strange temperament, indeed." has proven especially successful in stock because of its novel qualities and the number of strong acting roles it contains. Sydney Ayres will appear in the role of Owen Conway, the reformed, the best part he has essayed since coming to Oakland, and his interpretation of the character will be watched with interest. All the other favorite members of the company will be nicely bestowed, including George Friend, who returns after a month's vacation. "The Squaw Man" is one of the good plays promised soon at the Liberty.

"The Witching Hour"

Following the successful engagement of the "Blue Mouse" on the coast, the first Shubert attraction for the regular "open door" season will be John Mason and the original New York cast in "The Witching Hour" by Augustus Thomas. Mr. Mason, by the way, opens the season for the Shuberts, beginning in Atlantic City July 26th, after which the entire production will be moved across the continent. The premiere of "The Witching Hour" at the American will occur early in September. The play comes to the coast perhaps better endorsed than any dramatic piece that has been seen here for years. It ran over one season at the Hackett Theatre in New York, over six months in Chicago and met with unqualified success in all of the larger Eastern cities.

Shubert Successes

Out of the New York theatres now open, it is not unusual to find that the houses under the control of the Shuberts are showing the real hits of the summer. "The Midnight Sons" at the Broadway is playing to practically capacity and is the biggest thing in town; James T. Powers, in "Havana" at the Casino, is still doing excellent business with no signs of a let-up; "The Motor Girl," which recently opened, is attracting much attention at the Lyric; "Going Some," at the Maxine Elliott Theatre, is still enjoying a prosperous run, which seems to have no ending, and "The Beauty Spot," at the Herald Square, will remain there until a previous contract compels it to give way sometime in August to "The Broken Idol."

Two New Fitch Plays

Clyde Fitch has submitted the scenarios of a serious play and a comedy to the Shuberts, the latter to be the starring medium for Miss Zelda Sears, who to date has played seven Fitch characters in as many plays. During the past few months Mr. Fitch has frequently consulted Miss Sears, who is now in the cast of the Chicago "Blue Mouse" company, in regard to the selection of players. When the question recently arose as to which of his new pieces would be first produced, he wrote to Miss Sears asking her advice. She laconically replied: "Have you ever seen a funeral? If so, ask yourself what leads the procession—the live one or the other?" Mr. Fitch says the comedy will come second.

In the Limelight

Following "The Merry Widow" at the Van Ness Theatre will be seen Frederic Thompson's massive production of the comedy drama "Polly of the Circus." This is the Margaret Mayo work which ran for an entire year at the Liberty Theatre, New York.

Edith Talafierro will play the leading role in the production of "Polly of the Circus" when that success is seen at the Van Ness Theatre.

Over twelve thousand people have already seen "The Merry Widow" at the Van Ness Theatre. The engagement will break all theatrical records in this city. The advance sale of seats for the second week is enormous and standing room will be at a premium at every performance.

Work on the new Columbia Theatre is progressing very rapidly. San Francisco's leading playhouse will surely offer attractions before the close of the year. It will be the most beautiful home of amusement ever erected in the west.

Maxine Elliott, now abroad, returns to this country early in September or October preparatory to her opening at the theatre bearing her name. Miss Elliott has written to Lee Shubert that she has a trunk full of new plays but that she will not make a final selection until he has been consulted.

Perhaps the most interesting bit of theatrical news during the week was the definite announcement that the Shuberts had secured control of the entire block fronting on Broadway and running from 47th to 48th streets. The land is now occupied by a five story old-style factory and is utilized by Brewster & Company, carriage builders. This firm is expected to retire from the site by May, 1911. The property is regarded as the choicest on Longacre Square, the annual land rental being $150,000, exclusive of taxes. It is understood that the Shuberts will erect thereon a combined hotel and theatre.

A Righteous Man

Where was she now? He must ask Barthel Barnewitz about her some day, whether she—whether she—

"No!" He drew back from the window pane with a start, drew his tall figure to its full height, and folded his hands. "He that is holy, let him be holy still."

But stay! Over there, by the wall, something stood there. It seemed to draw his eyes as if by a magnet. Was it a shadow? Or a human being?

It was a woman—a woman with draggled skirts, wrapped in a large shawl. Her head was covered by another shawl. She stood in the street and raised her face to the moon; stood there long, quite motionless. Then slowly, hesitatingly, she came forward, step by step, forward to the rectory.

A woman alone in the night? Alone in the street, so late? The bell rang now, gently, timidly; the rusty wire gave out a whining sound. Then there came a knock at the door.

"Who is there?" The pastor stood for a moment behind the closed door; his heart beat strongly without reason that he knew, for he was a fearless man.

There was no answer except a repeated timid knock, and a renewed whining of the bell.

He opened the door, holding his green-shaded lamp above his head. There was no need for the lamp, the figure outside stood wrapped in moonlight. He did not recognize her.

"What can I do for you?"

A little hand drew the head-shawl away from her face. "Don't you know me, pastor? It's I—Barthel's Naemi."

"You? You?"

He did not tell her to come in; his tongue shook against his teeth—it seemed as if lamed. The blood rushed hot to his head, his hands were clammy cold. A droning melody hummed in his ears "rectory cook—so late at night—all so quiet—only the moon sees it—rectory cook—what does she want?—so alone—so young—"
